Though the Civil War in Switzerland has been virtually brought to a termination by the defeat of the Cantons associated in the Sonderbund, some slight traces of irritation still manifest themselves on the subject of the neutrality of the Canton of Neufchatel. To understand the anomalous position of this Canton some notice of its history is required:—

The succession to the Principality of Neufchatel became vacant in 1707 by the death of Marie de Longueville, Duchess of Nemours. Several claimants asserted their rights, but the States of Neufchatel themselves decided in favour of the King of Prussia, as the representative of the House of Chalons; and they accordingly transferred the fief to that Sovereign, reserving their own liberties and their treaties of alliance with the Swiss Cantons. This arrangement was recognized by the 9th article of the Treaty of Utrecht, between France and Prussia, and it subsisted for about a century. In 1805, however, Prussia was induced to cede the principality to Napoleon, who gave it to Berthier, as a fief of the French empire. At the peace of Paris the King of Prussia resumed possession of the State, and gave it a constitution during his visit to London in 1814. It was, however, thought expedient that the close relations which had subsisted for many centuries between Neufchatel and the Swiss Cantons should be rendered more definite and permanent by the admission of the state into the new Helvetic Confederation. This act was accompanied by no cession of the rights of the King of Prussia as Sovereign Prince of Neufchatel and Valangin; but, at the same time, the Swiss Diet did define with considerable force the nature of the obligations it imposed on the new member of their League. The 1st article of the Act of Union of the 7th of April, 1815, runs as follows in the protocol of the Diet of that date:—

"The Sovereign State of Neufchatel is received as a Canton into the Swiss Confederation. This reception takes place under the express condition that the fulfilment of all the duties which devolve upon the State of Neufchatel as a member of the Confederation, the participation of that State in deliberations on the genera. affairs of Switzerland, the ratification and performance of the resolutions of the Diet, shall exclusively concern the Government residing in Neufchatel, without requiring any further sanction or assent."

In the assertion of his rights as Sovereign Prince of Neufchatel, the King of Prussia presented to the Swiss Diet, on the 26th ult., by his Minister at Berne, Baron Sidon, a diplomatic note, in which his Majesty intimates that he has sanctioned and confirmed the resolution of the four orders of the Canton of Neufchatel to maintain an inviolable neutrality in the course of the present civil war; he adds that, in his desire to offer, not only to Neufchatel, but to the whole Confederation, his aid and protection, his Majesty had proposed Neufchatel as the seat of the conference of the five Powers, as an additional guarantee of its neutrality; and, lastly, he declares in precise terms that every violation of this neutrality by the Diet will be regarded as a breach of the peace, and an act of hostility against himself. The answer returned by the Radical majority of the Diet to this intimation, declares that the Diet reserves to itself full liberty of action on the subject, contending that the stipulation contained in the 1st article of the Act of Union, given above, is at variance with the part recently taken by the States of Neufchatel in submitting to the King of Prussia their declaration of neutrality, and their refusal to assist in the performance of a Federal order. Neufchatel thus finds itself most awkwardly placed between its Conservative predilections, backed by its loyalty to the house of Hohenzollern, and its Federal obligations, enforced by the majority of the Diet.

The Diet has decreed that the Cantons of the Sonderbund shall pay all the expenses of the war, which had been rendered necessary by their resistance to the Federal Government, and make good all the damage caused by their troops. The total expenses of the war, on the side of the Diet, is 3,163,000 francs, of which one million is to be paid by the Cantons of the Sonderbund before the 20th instant. The expenses of the troops of occupation which the Sonderbund Cantons are also to pay, will amount to about two millions of francs. The Diet reserves to itself full liberty of action Lereafter against Neufchatel and Inner Appenzell, which have not sent their contingent of men to the Federal Government.

General Dufour returned to Berne on the 3rd instant. Triumphal arches, decorated with red and white flags, had been erected for his reception on the bridge of the Nydak and at La Vue Creuse; but the General declined receiving any honours, and arrived at Berne in a close carriage, escorted by a small detachment of cavalry. The Directory has released a number of the Swiss officers to appear them of the fortunate submission of the Sonderbund. Mr. Peel has not yet presented to the President of the Directory the note of the British Cabinet, which, it was believed, would be delivered by Sir Stratford Canning.

FRANCE.

The French Government has decided to attempt the establishment of a line of steamers between Bourbon and Suez, in connexion with the regular mail communication which now exists, and Egypt, with India.

Rumours of increasing dissent in the French Cabinet were in circulation on the Paris Bourse on Saturday. It was said that the young and the old Conservatives had formed two separate camps, one only of which leant towards M. Guizot.

The Paris journals confirm the announcement that the Duke de Serra Capriola, the Neapolitan Ambassador in Paris, had been appointed Lieutenant-General of Sicily. His Excellency left Paris for Naples on Wednesday. This nomination was considered by the Italians as a favourable omen, M. de Serra Capriola belonging to the moderate Liberal party.

ITALY.

The affair of Lariglciana is on the point of being terminated in an amicable manner. The Duke of Modena, it is said, is to accept a pecuniary compensation [illegible] for the districts accorded to him by the Congress of Vienna, in exchange for the cession of the duchy of Lucca. The Tuscan troops in charge of the citadel at Pierra-Santa have, on their cantonments, and there is even some talk of the incorporation of the duchy of Massa-Carrara to Tuscany, or rather the adhesion of that duchy to the Customs League.

The King of Sardinia signed on the 27th ult. the organic law of the municipalities and provincial councils, the most important of the enactments promised in the edict of the 29th of October. His Majesty had, moreover, established a Ministry of Public Instruction, at the head of which was placed the Marquis Alberi de Sostegno, formerly Chairman of the Reform Committee.

The King of Naples has refused to join the Customs Union, being desirous first to ascertain the working of the system formed by the Pope, the King of Sardinia, and the Grand Duke of Tuscany.

SPAIN.

PORTUGAL.

The election of the Electoral Colleges took place on Sunday, the 28th, in all Portugal. The returns for Lisbon and the neighbouring districts, as far as they were known, give a majority of 5535 to the Cabralistas against the Septembristas, who only polled 3635. The Ministerial candidates were all withdrawn or defeated. Rumours were again current of the resignation of the Cabinet. The Duke of Saldanha had, by letters published in the Diario, formally joined the Cabinet.

REPEAL.

Sir G. Grey appealed to Mr. F. O'Connor to waive his claim for precedence, and to give way for the discussion on the Bill for the Prevention of Crime and Outrage in Ireland.

Mr. F. O'Connor refused to give way, and proceeded to move for a Select Committee to inquire and report on the means by which the dissolution of the Parliament of Ireland was effected; of the effects of that measure upon Ireland, and upon the labourers in husbandry and operatives in manufactures in England; and on the probable consequences of continuing that Legislative Union between both countries. The hon. member gave his version of the history of Ireland from 964 to the present day, contending that the people had ever been made the tools of Saxon invaders and Protestant upstarts; that the Union had been carried by fraud and bribery, and that every article of the Union had been violated. He also insisted that Ireland had never been conquered; that Ireland never had a Parliament of her own; that nothing but a genuine Irish Parliament would redress the wrongs of Ireland.

Sir G. Grey sarcastically complimented the hon. member for his antiquarian lore; but he thought he would have acted more fairly to the House if he had submitted some distinct resolution that would test the sense of the House on the question of the Union, instead of asking for a committee of inquiry. The right hon. gentleman hoped the House would meet the motion with a direct negative.

Mr. H. Grattan severely censured Mr. O'Connor for the aspersions he had cast on Lord Charlemont, Mr. Grattan, Mr. Ponsonby, and others. He then read Mr. F. O'Connor a severe lecture for reviving old and obsolete transactions, which ought to be obliterated from the public memory if the different classes of Irishmen were to live together peaceably in society. He would not say that this motion was a claptrap motion; but still it had the appearance of having been brought forward to supplant other individuals who had taken up this question. He therefore would not support this motion. He concluded by appealing to the House as a jury to decide whether Mr. F. O'Connor was or was not guilty of uttering libels against the memory of his father, Mr. Ponsonby, and Lord Charlemont; and as one of that jury, he declared upon his honour (amid loud cheers) that Mr F. O'Connor was guilty.

Mr. John O'Connell spoke for two hours on the evils that, he said, had resulted from the Act of Union. The hon. member argued that England had robbed Ireland in every way, and had paid back nothing.

Mr. Trelawny expressed his disgust at perpetually hearing the howl of Irish members dunning and boring England for money, while they obstructed in every way a bill absolutely necessary for the suppression of an atrocious system of assassination, disgraceful to a Christian country. He advised the Government, should Irish members persist in preventing the passing of the bill, to act upon their own responsibility, and come to Parliament afterwards for an Act of Indemnity.

Dr. Bowring, Mr. Reynolds, Mr. E. B. Roche, Major Blackall, Mr. Maurice O'Connell, and Mr. Fagan followed.

The last-named hon. member's lengthy and tedious speech, for the most part read from a paper, was delivered amidst the repeated interruptions, laughs, and jeers of the House. Having protested in addressing the House, despite its manifest unwillingness to listen, the honourable member moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Walter had heard much of the capacity of Irishmen for self-government; but, if he were to judge of Irishmen from the specimen of Irish members sent into that House, he would say that they were about as fit for self-government as the blacks. There was a proverb with the blacks, "that if nigger was not nigger, Irishman would be nigger."

Mr. J. O'Connell rose to order. He appealed to the House if such buffoonery were to be permitted.

The Speaker called Mr. J. O'Connell to order. He was clearly out of order in applying the term "buffoonery" to the observations of any hon. member.

Mr. J. O'Connell bowed to the decision of the chair, and retracted the expression.

Mr. Walter resumed; he had only quoted Bishop Berkeley. The question Parliament was called upon to decide was, how atrocious crime and outrage were to be suppressed in Ireland, and were they to be prevented by time-consuming speeches from coming to that decision?

After a few words from Mr. J. O'Connell, charging the House with a desire to crush Irish discussion,

Mr. Fagan continued his speech, and finally withdrew his motion for adjournment.

Mr. F. O'Connor replied, and the House divided—

Sir G. Grey postponed the second reading of the Bill for the Prevention of Crime and Outrage in Ireland to Wednesday, appealing to Mr. Anstey to give it precedence, at twelve o'clock, over his Roman Catholic Relief Bill.

Mr. Anstey declined to accede to the request.

The House then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Wednesday.

The House of Commons assembled at noon and sat till six o'clock.

ROMAN CATHOLIC RELIEF BILL.

Mr. C. Anstey moved the second reading of the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, the provisions of which he explained. It was, he said, intended to remove the pains and penalties attached to religious belief, that contained in the statute-book, and was similar to the bill introduced by Mr. Watson last session.

Sir R. Inglis opposed the bill, and moved, as an amendment, that it be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. H. Drummond denied that any pains or penalties for religious belief remained on the statute-book.

Lord Ashley and Sir Robert Inglis said it was ridiculous to compare the obedience which the Jesuits voluntarily vowed to their superior with the obedience which the Roman Catholic laity owed to the head of the Church. To the charge of regarding the Pope as a temporal prince, he would merely reply that he and every Roman Catholic Member of Parliament solemnly denied it on their oath upon taking their seats.

Mr. Walpole opposed the bill.

Sir G. Grey was willing to consent to the removal of those obsolete, antiquated statutes proposed to be repealed by the bill, not that he thought that any practical grievance arose out of them, but because he did not think the House ought to refuse what was asked by the Roman Catholics as a matter of feeling. But he was not willing to assent to that portion of the bill which attempted to disturb the enactments taken as securities in 1829, although he would not carry the doctrine of finality so far as to say that the House might not take those securities into consideration, with the view of seeing if other and less objectionable securities might not be substituted for them. He was, therefore, prepared to give a second reading to the bill, with the intention, when in committee, of striking out that portion which repealed the clauses of the Emancipation Act.

Mr. Plumptre and Mr. Newdegate strongly opposed the bill; Mr. J. O'Connell supported it.

Mr. Gladstone thought that the allegation of wounded feelings by the Roman Catholics, although they complained of no practical grievance, was a good reason for removing obsolete statutes, provided no valid reasons for retaining them existed. He thought, too, that though there might be danger in opening the question of the enactments of the Act of 1829, yet, if it were just to open that question, the House should look to the justice of the case, and should not be deterred by the apprehension of danger. With respect to the clauses of the Emancipation Act, called securities, he was of opinion that they could not be entirely maintained. It was not just absolutely to exclude from this country subjects of her Majesty for the simple reason that they belonged to the religious orders, some distinction of orders might be devised. He also thought that greater liberty ought to be given to religious ceremonies.

Mr. Shiel instanced, as one practical grievance, that Roman Catholic barristers were excluded from the Lord Chancellorship of Ireland.

Mr. Goulburn and Mr. Farrer opposed the bill.

Mr. Cardwell cordially supported it, and urged upon the Home Secretary the necessity of considering seriously the real condition of the Roman Catholics.

Mr. Hume supported the bill.

Mr. J. Stuart objected to the first part of the Bill, because it trenched upon the supremacy of the Crown in matters ecclesiastical.

The House divided

The Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed this day fortnight, with the understanding that it would then be further postponed.

The House went into committee, and a resolution upon which to found the Crime and Outrage (Ireland) (Canadian Forest) Bill was agreed to.

A new writ was ordered to issue for the city of Edinburgh, in the room of Mr. Cowan.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Thursday.

Their Lordships sat for a short time, but no business of importance was done. Adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Thursday.

Crime in Ireland.—On the motion for the second reading of the Crime and Outrage (Ireland) Bill a long discussion ensued, which was terminated by a division, in which the second reading was carried by a majority of 277—the numbers being 296 and 19. Adjourned at a quarter to one o'clock.

Railway Companies. A meeting of delegates of France, Prussia, and Belgium took place on the 7th inst. at Brussels, under the presidency of the Minister of Public Works of Belgium, to make arrangements for putting into correspondence with each other the different lines of railway which unite those three kingdoms.

The New County Courts.—On Saturday last notice was served upon the various clerks of the County Courts throughout England and Wales (pursuant to an order moved for by Mr. Grainger, M.P. for Durham) to make a return of the total number of plaints entered in each Court from the time when the Act came into operation, in March last, up to the 30th of November inclusive, specifying the various amounts, the total number of days that each Court has sat, and the average number of hours of each sitting, the total number of cases tried by each Court, the gross total amount of monies received, distinguishing the amount received for fees for each officer, and an account of the general fund, from the amount received to the credit of suitors; the total number of cases tried in each Court with the assistance of a jury, specifying the number of such cases in which a verdict has been given in favour of the party requiring a jury to be summoned. In Westminster County Court, alone, the number of plaints entered up to the 30th of November last amounted to 12,416; of this number, 11,291 have been heard, and (with the exception of about 40 adjourned) adjudicated upon.

ELECTRO-MAGNETIC HEAT AND COLD DETECTOR.

At the present moment, when winter has fairly set in, and frost has already indicated itself, I have ventured, at the solicitation of more than one friend, to describe a little contrivance which, perhaps, may interest each of your readers as take pleasure in the cultivation of flowers in hot-houses and greenhouses, and delight to rear the beautiful plants of foreign regions in an exotic climate prepared artificially for the exemption.

The apparatus which I constructed two years ago is abundantly simple. It consisted of a thermometer, into the bulb of which a platinum wire was inserted, so that a communication might be effected with the mercury. The other part of the tube was open, and allowed another platinum wire to be passed down to any corresponding degree in the scale: so that, whenever the mercury reached a definite altitude, a metallic communication between the two wires was effected. I have lately, for various reasons, employed a thermometer constructed for me by Messrs. Horne and Thornthwaite of Newgate-street. It is formed like the double-registering thermometer, into two points of which the platinum wires were inserted, one corresponding to a low degree, the other to a high degree; so that, whenever the heat was between these two points, a perfect metallic communication ensued. This latter form is only applicable with very feeble currents, or gas may be generated, and the tube explode. These thermometers may be made of different ranges; for a greenhouse, between 40 and 100, for an intermediate house, between 55 and 110; for a hothouse, between 65 and 110; or, indeed, for any other desired temperatures.

By connecting these two platinum wires with two copper wires, they may be made the part of a circuit into which a voltaic battery may be inserted, which will exhibit its peculiarities at any part. Hence, by conducting the wires to the gardener's house, the mansion of its owner, or to any other number of places, it may instantly be seen whether the temperature of the house is that which the gardener desires. The circuit may be of any length; it may pass through the greenhouse, hothouse, pinery, frames; and the circuit cannot be completed unless each place possesses its own peculiar temperature. For the purpose of ascertaining whether the desired temperature is maintained, a needle is employed, which remains deflected as long as the circuit is completed; but to obtain evidence when the gardener is asleep, an alarum is added, which rings violently the moment any one of the entire range of houses varies from its proper temperature. Any number of alarums may be introduced into the circuit; for instance, at the residences of all the gardeners, the house, or elsewhere, as there is no limit to the clatter which may be made if the fires have been neglected.

The force to be employed may be obtained from a single cell or one of my batteries, weakly charged; or even sufficient force may be obtained by plunging deeply into be ground a zinc and copper plate, as in Bain's clever Electro-Magnetic Clock Patent.

This test is essentially active, not passive; responsible, not irresponsible; and it may be as well depended upon as even the employment of a man continually to pass into the houses to note the temperature.

A cheaper modification makes an admirable fire detector; for, if two pieces of platinum be inserted into a piece of glass tube, and then a little metal melted, a metallic communication would ensue. If, however, over the mercury metal tallow be placed, and then allowed to harden, the tube may be inverted, and yet the communication be kept up till the tallow was again melted, when the mercury would fall to the bottom. Other substances, of different degrees of fusibility, might be substituted for the tallow, for different temperatures. As soon as the communication was broken, the alarum would be rung, and the inmates of the house roused.

The little house in which this contrivance is fixed, neither deserves the name of a hothouse nor greenhouse. It is placed in such a position that, during the winter, the sun's rays never reach sufficient altitude to warm the plants. It is, however, stocked with orchids and ferns, which I have begged from various sources; and, therefore, I trust that this little communication may be found of any value, that it may serve as an inducement for other kind friends to add tomy stock.

Finsbury Circus, Nov. 21st, 1847. ALFRED SMEE.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

Marylebone Vestry.—Mr. Charles Cochrane, the late candidate for Westminster, and a deputation of pauper stone-breakers, waited on the Marylebone Vestry on Saturday last, for the purpose of presenting a memorial from the stone-breakers, on the subject of their employment and mode of employment at the pauper stone-yard. An angry discussion took place between Mr. Cochrane and several members of the Vestry, the latter ultimately declining to interfere with the existing arrangements. Some discussion followed on the Government sanatory measure and the proposed repeal of the window-tax, after which the Vestry broke up.

Death of Mr. Murphy, the Weather Prophet.—Mr. Murphy, whose lucky predictions some few years since nearly cost Messrs. Whittaker, the publishers of his almanack, the destruction of their premises, owing to the rush of customers anxious to secure copies of his incubrations, died suddenly on Wednesday last, at his lodgings. He had just completed arrangements for the issue of an edition of his almanack for 1848, and was with his publisher, Mr. Effingham Wilson, in perfect health, only a few hours prior to his death.

Burglary in the Metropolis.—On Sunday morning, between three and four o'clock, the metropolis was visited with a violent storm of wind, hail, and rain, that continued with unabated fury for full half an hour. The wind, which at first blew in a S.W. direction, veered towards the N.W., blowing with terrific violence, the rain descending in a perfect cataract, accompanied with hailstones of an extraordinary size.

Daring Robberies.—On Saturday last, information of the following daring robberies was circulated through the divisions of the Metropolitan and City police:—From No. 4, Mora-place, City-road, the property of Mr. Wilson, tea silk neck scarfs, three dozen figured satin scarfs, various other scarfs, ninety four silk handkerchiefs, various patterns; a mahogany tea caddy, canteen, and tea spoons; a silver watch, and other articles.—From the College, Eton, Bucks, a lever gold watch, ten silver watches, two silver table forks, about a hundred brooches, the same number of gold seals and keys, sundry lockets and gold studs, and a half-a-crown of the reign of George II. From 137, Grove-street, Camden-town, the property of Mr. Bennett, a number of silver table and other spoons.—From No. 16, Park-street, Grosvenor-square, the property of Dr. Marson, eleven silver dessert spoons, two silver sauce ladles, eight silver teaspoons, two silver forks, a silver cream jug, a silver oval teapot, a silver chocolate pot, a silver tankard, and other valuable articles, with a quantity of wearing apparel.—From the dwelling-house of the Rev. Mr. Meadows, at Gosport, a gold Geneva watch, with a gold cable chain attached, with hand clasp of a ruby; a mourning brooch set round with pearls; an amethyst ring, a gold watch hook, a ruby ring, and other articles of jewellery, and £3 in gold and silver.

Post-Office Notice.—The following notice has been issued by command of the Postmaster-General:—"Information having been received from the Director-General of the French Post-office, that, under existing circumstances, letters from the United Kingdom for Austria would be accelerated for some time to come by being sent through Prussia and Belgium, instead of by way of France, through which country they are now forwarded, the Postmaster-General thinks it necessary to make this intimation to the public, and to give notice that letters of this description will be transmitted by the route pointed out, provided they are specially addressed."

Unfinished Public Works in Ireland.—A deputation of Irish members of Parliament had an interview with Sir William Somerville on Saturday, in reference to the unfinished presentments under the Labour-rate Act. The following gentlemen attended:—Sir Lucius O'Brien, William N. M'Namara, William Monsell, Henry A. Herbert, Daniel O'Connell, John O'Connell, Edmund Burke Roche, Timothy O'Brien, Francis Scully, John Somers, and John O'Brien. The object of the deputation was to procure from the Government the necessary advances to complete the unfinished presentments under the Labour-rate Act, not by grant, but by loan, which the country was willing and would be fully able to repay. It was estimated that an inconsiderable sum, as compared with the outlay already made, would complete them. Sir William Somerville feared that the financia. distress of the country would prevent a compliance with the application; but he should feel most happy in advancing, should it be in his power, important objects of the deputation. It was suggested by the members of the deputation that should Government be unwilling to make the necessary advances, the counties of Ireland should be enabled to borrow from private parties on the security of the county rates.

FOREIGN SHEEP.—(SPANISH AND GERMAN.)

FOREIGN CATTLE,

We this week present to our readers sketches of Foreign Sheep and Oxen recently taken at Smithfield market. The importance of the trade in this department of our import may be exemplified by the numbers weekly affecting our home markets. We give the foreign importations for November, 1847—arrivals of live stock from abroad into London and the outports

	Beasts.	Sheep.	Lambs.	Calves.	Pigs.
London ..	3486 ..	16,213 ..	121 ..	667 ..	41
Outports ..	2000 ..	4,200 ..	— ..	90 ..	10
Total ..	5486 ..	20,413 ..	121 ..	757 ..	51

It will be seen from our Engravings that the animals imported chiefly from Germany, Spain, and Holland, are in bad condition; and many attempts have been made in feeding them to improve their condition; but we believe they have proved profitless. They are brought in large numbers for the purpose of supplying our merchant ships and the Royal Navy, and sold in the metropolis to the poorer population. We may safely assert that the foreigner is far behind the English in the breed and feed of cattle; and we cannot anticipate that for a great length of time we are in any danger of foreign cattle being able to compete with English.

GERMAN SHEEP. GERMAN BULL. SPANISH SHEEP.

FOREIGN CATTLE.

It will be observed in the specimens, that all the foreign cattle lack the "points" which have gained the prizes at our annual Christmas Show; and they would be condemned as worthless by English graziers.

An order from the Board of Customs has lately been issued, in substance similar to the one issued February, 1845, directing the collectors and comptrollers of the Customs at the several outports of the kingdom to be made acquainted that information has been officially received of the prevalence of an infectious disorder among sheep in several parts of the Continent; they have directed that they will give instructions to the officers under their survey carefully to examine all sheep and cattle which may be imported into their respective ports from the continental states of Europe; and that in the event of their appearing to be infected with any disorder, they are not to permit them to be landed from the importing vessel without an inspection as to their soundness by some competent person, and to report the circumstances forthwith to the Commissioners for their direction. The Lords of the Treasury have, accordingly, through their Secretary, Mr. Trevelyan, with reference to the instructions already conveyed to the Board of Customs on the subject of a certain disease raging among cattle on the Continent, desired that the Board would enjoin upon all their officers the greatest attention to the state of the cattle imported; they (the officers) were to be apprised of this communication, and enjoined to a strict attention to the matter, with reference to the previous order of the Government on the subject, taking care not to fail to represent to the Board any matter that should arise fit for their cognizance.

ENGLISH CATTLE.

In contrast to the opposite Page, we give Pictures of English Grass-fed Cattle, sketched in Lincolnshire, by Mr. Harrison Weir; from which it will be seen that our cattle, fed in the ordinary way of business, is far superior to anything we get from abroad. These Engravings are from Cattle on Mr. Ingram's Abbey Farm, near Boston, Lincolnshire. These fine specimens are entirely grass-fed: each beast weighs about 140 stones (of 8lb.); and the sheep 120lb. each.

The oxen which are preferred for grazing in Lincolnshire are the short-horns, and some crosses of long-horns. Mr. Collins's Durham breed has been introduced, and kept up with considerable success. Some rich proprietors and farmers are very careful in maintaining the reputation of their stock; and fine bulls are reared without regard to expense, which is well repaid by the superiority of their produce. The most judicious graziers are of opinion that middle-sized oxen are more profitable for grazing than the larger; an ox of about 80 stones of 14lb is thought to fatten more rapidly in proportion than either larger or smaller, provided the breed be good.

The supply in Smithfield of home-fed cattle, during the past month has been:—

	Head.
Beasts	20,514
Cows	583
Sheep	121,320
Calves	1,508
Pigs ..	3,206

In Great Britain, the various breeds of cattle have been vastly improved, both in the weight of carcase, the quality of the beef, and the abundance of milk, by the extraordinary attention that has been given to the selection and crossing of the best breeds, according to the objects in view. This sort of improvement began about the middle of the last century, or rather later, and was very much forwarded by the skill and enterprise of Mr. Bakewell of Dishley, and Mr. Culley of Northumberland. The success of their efforts was very great, and roused a spirit of emulation in others; so that improved breeds have been very generally introduced. This advance has not been alone owing to the above circumstance, but also to the great improvement made in their feeding.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

"It never rains but it pours"—says the proverb: and there is considerable truth in the axiom. People are themselves prone to follow when others lead and they give a like direction to natural causes. Upon this principle, as soon as the money panic began to show symptoms of subsiding, another apprehension makes its appearance. Men had got over the immediate prospect of a prison at home, and lo! they are told to look out for a similar fate elsewhere. The French have only to cross the straits of Dover and the thing is done. This took us by surprise—because the revolution which latter years have wrought in the material of warfare, seemed to make an invasion the most hopeless of forlorn hopes. There was a time, indeed, when the coast of Galway was exposed—and from the prevalence of westerly winds, it was not easy of approach from the mother country—now in a few hours you throw upon any part of it a fortification a thousand times stronger than the Tower of London. But what has all this to do with the National Sports? The question is a very natural one, and we should have said, "nothing on earth"—a little while ago.

During the last week, however, an opinion was broached upon good authority, it was stated which inculcated a very different doctrine. The Great Captain of the time has written a letter, or been represented to have written a letter, declaring the nation to be in great danger from foreign attacks, and attributes no small portion of the jeopardy to the fact—whereof, till the moment, we were perfectly ignorant—that nearly the whole of our manly exercises are prohibited by legislative enactment. This startling statement is thus made, in a communication from the Duke to Sir J. Burgoyne. . . "The country requires to be told that it is no longer insular: that it is connected with the Continent by a causeway of steam: that it contains, perhaps, the least warlike population of any in Europe, untaught and untrained in arms, and slow to beat their tae. It should, also, be had in remembrance that almost all manly sports, and boxing in particular, have been put down by Act of Parliament, and with it much of the national spirit: that athletic games are discouraged by the Puritan, and falling daily into disuse: that the Hindoo dexterity of our fingers has been bought at the expense of our strength and muscles."

One wonders how such a paragraph as this could find its way into circulation—or, being sent abroad, how any one is found to deal with it as genuine, or worth alluding to. But this attributed letter has been copied into half the journals in Great Britain—and how many will argue from it that racing, and hunting, and coursing, and shooting, are all as contrary to law in England as the latter is opposed to public convenience in Ireland—upon the existing principle of the amusement. It is to be hoped the writer—whoever he may be—is as mistaken in his views relating to the defensive position of our island, as he is in the state of the law as it affects our National Sports.

Prize-fighting, to be sure, when it involves breaches of the peace, comes within the jurisdiction of the police; but it is "almost" and actually the only "pastime" that labours under any restraint: always excepting the sskay influences, which have not smiled upon fox-hunting during the past week—for, perhaps, the country never rode so terribly heavy as at this writing. But, like all panics, this of deep ground and perishing fences will pass presently. Then we will take the field—without the blood: till then, we "hold hard."

TATTERSALL'S.

The Steeple Chasers have now possession of the field; books and "horse lists" are opened in all quarters, and, for some weeks to come, it will be in vain to look for any regular business on the Derby. A good deal of money was laid out this afternoon on some nags engaged at Wolverhampton next week, but no movement of any interest took place; a simple quotation of the closing prices, therefore, will suffice:—

APPLICATION OF CHLOROFORM TO ANIMALS.—Saturday last an interesting and most successful experiment with this beneficent agent was tried on a lame horse, belonging to Mr. Reid, Drum, East Lothian. Dr. Robertson and Mr. F. Imlach, from Edinburgh, Dr. Lorimer, from Haddington, and others were present. About two ounces of the chloroform were poured on a piece of flannel cloth, below which was a sponge, the whole being placed in a tin case, which was tied over the horse's nose, and surrounded with a flannel bag. In 3½ minutes the animal fell over, and in five minutes it was perfectly insensible. When in that condition, Mr. Cockburn, veterinary surgeon, Haddington, performed the usually painful operation of cutting the nerves of sensation in both of its fore feet. On cutting the second nerve the poor beast made a slight movement, showing the chloroform was beginning to lose its effect, but a second application of another ounce allowed the other two remaining nerves to be cut without a quiver. In twenty-five minutes from the commencement the animal was again on its legs, now perfectly sound.

CULTIVATION OF COTTON IN ALGERIA.—Our French neighbours, in order that they may become less dependent upon America for the raw material than they have hitherto been, are now turning their attention to the capabilities of Algeria for the production of cotton; and strong hopes are entertained that that colony will soon furnish a supply sufficient to enable the manufacturers of France to dispense with imports from the United States. In consequence of the favourable reports of the manufacturers upon the samples submitted to them, the French Government is likely to adopt measures for promoting the growth of cotton in Algeria upon an extensive scale.

Strata Florida Abbey, engraved to our Journal of last week.—We are informed that a full account of this venerable foundation will appear in the April number of "The Archæologia Cambrensis." The history of the Abbey is too famous, and too closely connected with the struggles and destinies of South Wales, to have escaped the notice of antiquaries and topographers; of whose researches, as well as his own personal investigation, the author of the above Memoir (the Rev. Mr. Roberts) has judiciously availed himself.

Correspondence by Newspapers.—By a recent regulation of the General Post-Office, hereafter any writing or marks will be allowed on a newspaper passing by post between one part of the United Kingdom and another, provided that a postage of a penny be pre-paid by means of a stamp conspicuously affixed outside the cover or folded newspaper; it being understood that, in those cases where the newspaper may be liable to postage, irrespective of such writings or marks (as when it is both posted and delivered in the same town), the penny stamp shall cover the writing and the postage also. But this privilege is to be confined to writing or marks on the newspaper itself, and is not to extend to the cover, which, as heretofore, must contain nothing but the address. Any writing or marks other than the address on the cover (if the postage be not prepaid as above) on the newspaper itself, will subject the newspaper to the same rate of postage as that to which an unpaid letter of the same weight is liable. This privilege does not, however, extend to newspapers sent to or from the Colonies and parts abroad; these will continue liable to treble rate of postage when written upon, or when containing enclosures. One of the advantages of the new sanction to writing on newspapers will be, that the person sending the paper will have a ready opportunity of calling the attention of the person addressed to any particular passage in the newspaper.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1847.

The first great step in the series of sanatory measures that must be adopted for the Metropolis, has been taken. This "beginning" has been the "end" of the old Commissioners of Sewers, 671 in number, who mismanaged the drainage of all the metropolitan districts, except the City. Advantage has been taken of the fact that four of the Boards expired this month—they were all renewable every ten years—to get rid of the whole of them by a general use of the Chancellor's supersedeas. The substitute for the old, divided, patchwork system of jurisdictions, ratings, and powers, is one Board of twenty-three members—in fact, a consolidated commission for the metropolis. This is a bolder stroke than was expected from the Government; and we may begin to expect earnest measures. There may actually be a survey of London made, that will result in a good map, with the levels properly laid down, so that an extensive system of sewers may now be constructed, at a lower level than that of another "Board," so as to be perfectly useless; no district or parochial wisdom suffices to suspend the laws of nature, and make water run up hill. Such a thing has, we understand, happened ere now, to the great profit of the contractors and the infinite loss of the rate-payers. The small, compact Board will have the advantage of unity of action; and, undoubtedly, an enormous field; but there is one impediment in their way; the City of London, the old and obstinate Corporation that contrives to get itself excepted from all wholesome control, looks from behind Temple-bar, and laughs the Woods and Forests to scorn. From a large district, every drain that runs southward to the river, must pass through the City, or be made to communicate with those already constructed. The new Commissioners may place a plan of London before them, and tracing the City boundary on the north, east, and west, perceive how it

Comes cranking in,
And cuts them there a monstrous cantle out.

All within those bounds is beyond the newly-created jurisdiction.

It is possible that the instinct of self preservation may induce the City authorities to do more, and do it better, than heretofore. The question is beginning to move; the Consolidated Board will have more weight than the divided Commissions; a good understanding, and hearty co-operation with it, will be the only course that can save the City from "amalgamation." The change would have been more complete had this been done at once; but, as it is, the step is such an advance, that it will be accepted with extreme satisfaction. It need hardly be pointed out what valuable aid the machinery of the Commission, when it begins its work, will be to any Board of Health, permanent or temporary. It is quite time some practical steps on this subject were taken; for, though it is quite twelve years since the Cholera last appeared among us, we are not much better prepared to meet it now, than we were at that period.

It is singular how little progress is made in anything affecting the public, except under the influence of terror or compulsion of some kind. Nothing but a hostile majority, and the loss of power, can convince a Minister that the question he opposes is ripe for decision, and must be settled; his successor walks into his place—and does it. The wreck of a steamer, with the loss of a few passengers, produces a shower of letters to the papers on the advantage of paddle-box boats. An accident on a railway has the same effect; it is followed by scores of suggestions of infallible modes by which passengers could communicate with the guard, and the guard with the drivers. A madman discovered in a first-class carriage, will make it settle entire public nervous for a week. But, after the first shock is over, the whole thing is forgotten; passengers ride and pay as before, and all the agitation sinks into silence without any result. But it is evident that the art of constructing railway carriages is only in its infancy; it is beginning to be discovered that, within a certain limit, the larger the carriages are built, the safer they run; the limit to their size has not yet been discovered, as but few experiments have been made. It is a question well worth the attention of Companies who are building carriages, or replacing the old ones, planned in the first stages of the railway system, whether they could not expand their notions a little on the American plan. The question has been touched this week in a letter in a morning paper, addressed to Mr. Strutt. The writer says :—

Target as you have been for the assault of railwaymen, you yet must have found leisure to remark in the railway press and others the multitudinous contrivances gratuitously presented to the public—like Mr. Stephenson's breaks—for the purpose of effecting telegraphic communications between the guard and engine-driver, cords and speak ng tubes, and wires, and gas whistles, and one-stroke bells, and electric telegraphs, and long step boards, and numberless other perfect and infallible modes of enabling the guard to tell the engine-driver to be so good as to stop while he helps the passengers in the last carriage to restore the wheels to the rails, to prevent the carriage from knocking itself to pieces with its passengers against bridges, as in the late accident on the Leeds and Manchester.

These devices are all very ingenious, but not to be compared to the simpler plan of "enabling the public to help themselves." At present, a passenger in a railway carriage is nearly as passive in a disaster as any part of the carriage itself. Suppose the system of construction was such as to enable the passenger, when anything went wrong in one department, to walk into another. It appears that

This is no "wild speculation." In the United States railway carriages are made forty feet in length and nine feet in width. Guard and money-taker are comprised in the same individual, and he can walk through the train at his pleasure, consoling the sick, instructing the ignorant, repressing the riotous, comforting the cowardly, and collecting the cash. Something of the old guard—not Napoleonic—there is in all this, very pleasant to passengers. In parts of Germany a similar system prevails.

On the Belgian lines the same thing is to be seen. The guard can walk from one end of the train to the other; and in any urgent case—that of being caged with a madman, or otherwise "excitable person"—a summons brings him to your assistance, and that without stopping. Here you cannot move from a train in such a case than if you were riding inside a cannon ball; death or the next station may put an end to the adventure, but between these two extremes there may be a world of danger and suffering, without a chance of escape from it. A greater facility of locomotion within the train would be a resort in case of peril, and at all times a consolation. It is asked,

Why can we not have the same system in England? Every man his own railway signal. On the Eastern Counties line the Directors have made the discovery that large carriages are more economical than small ones, and they rival Brother Jonathan and eclipse the broad gauge in size. They claim the credit of having forty-five square feet of floor area per wheel, and making eight wheels do the work usually assigned to eighteen, with greater safety to the public. If this be so, surely they might increase them a little in width, and give the public a passage way.

We have established post-offices in the mail trains; on some lines we have advanced to "saloons," with tables and fittings for conviviality—a sandwich or a cigar—to beguile the weariness of rails and cuttings; but as yet these carriages are kept rather exclusive, as if Directors were afraid of making the public too comfortable. But we shall progress in time; and we foresee the day when we shall fly from London to John o' Groats in a miniature drawing-room. The writer we have quoted is even more sanguine, and sees visions of comfort at present incredible, only because not attempted :—

Think of the luxury to the first class of calling "guard," without putting the head out of the window, purchase candy "striking on the bell," nay, perhaps ordering a cup of coffee or a sack posset, sherry cobbler, mint julep, gin sling, or timber doodle. And no waiting for check-takers at stations—all free as air on arriving, and no ten minutes lost in arbitrary imprisonment on the one side, and hatred and malice and all uncharitableness on the part of the usually gentle public, on the other.

If often happens that zeal in a good cause leads a man to outstep discretion in serving it; for the sake of the cause itself, that indiscretion must be rebuked. Every one must have heard of that abomination, Enon Chapel, and the horrible vault beneath it, whose "rotten jaws," the avarice of some parties, who seem to be unknown, was daily "cramming with more food." Some ten days ago the public was startled by a brief announcement in the papers, that the vault or cellar, which, it may be, had been lit with gas, and was being shown as an exhibition! Most people thought it was a hoax, or did not believe it; it seemed too monstrous that such a thing should occur in a Christian city. But a police report of Wednesday last explains the mystery. It appears that Mr. Walker, the surgeon, who has connected his name with the opposition to burial in cities, has, by some means unexplained, got possession of the vault of Enon Chapel or sanctuary upon, for we believe it is or has been both, and in order to convince an incredulous public, that in his speeches and pamphlets he had not exceeded, nor even equalled, the truth, he hit on the singular expedient of exhibiting the place "in which there are hundreds of coffins containing heaps of bones," with all its repulsive horrors. So the gas was turned on, and a crowd of morbid-minded people were admitted daily, "by ticket," procured at Mr. Walker's residence. The crowd became so great, and the nuisance so flagrant and scandalous, that the Churchwardens of St. Clement's Danes interfered, and the result was the compelling Mr. Walker to furnish an explanation of the affair at Bow-street.

That explanation was not wholly satisfactory; at best it proved excessive want of judgment on the part of Mr. Walker, in the mode he took of converting the vault to public use. The Churchwardens could "not exactly" say that money was taken for the tickets to view the shocking sight; but, it seems, money was received in the manner of a collection; "each person put down what he pleased, it being asked for on leaving the vaults." This money, Mr. Walker said, was "to be applied to the decent interment of the bodies"—as soon as the exhibition was closed, we presume. Acquitting Mr. Walker entirely of money motive in the display of the proceeding remains, and will damage the influence he had acquired. He says he only wanted "to afford the public a practical proof of a circumstance, however abominable, they could not give credit to did they not see it." It is those who have the power of suppressing such a disgusting den, whom it was important to convince, and that had been done. The purchasers of the Holborn Estate had undertaken "to remove from the vaults under the chapel the several coffins to a more convenient burying-ground, with the intention of converting the chapel into an infant school; but, interested persons, having obtained possession of the vaults, prevented such a laudable object being carried into effect."

Why, the very moment there was the possibility of removing such an evil, it ought to have been seized. But, to keep it open for the purpose of converting the public, on the "seeing is believing" principle, was a shameful outrage on health, feeling, and decency; it was, as Mr. Jardine truly remarked, as great an abuse as the evil it was meant to expose. The Magistrate admitted Mr. Walker's "laudable motives;" but the case wears an unfortunate appearance. And the conclusion was unsatisfactory: all that was promised was "a limitation of the number of persons to be admitted to view in future." This must not be; the disgusting exhibition must be stopped at once, and crushed out of existence. Who does this most filthy hole belong to? What is the nature of the holding, that it can both excite public indignation, and defy it; first, by crowding and packing it with the dead, and then making their decay a spectacle to the diseased curiosity of the living? In the name of all that is sacred and decent, is there no authority that can shut its doors, and say, this shall not be? We do implore the Government to consider this part of the subject. There are many more Enon Chapels, and opening the "chambers of death" may prove a new field of speculation: there are plenty of wretches who would have no scruple in working it. If something is not done to check it, we may expect to see advertising carts parading the "immense attraction" of brilliantly illuminated vaults, and bodies in all stages of corruption, from the skeleton to the corse yet "festering in its shroud"—with a brass band to enliven the amusement!

POSTSCRIPT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS FRIDAY.

The Speaker took the chair shortly before four o'clock.

The Hon. Captain DUNCOMBE took the oaths and subscribed the parliamentary roll.

Mr. STRUTT presented several returns from the Office of Commissioners of Railways.

Petitions were presented by different members in favour of the claims of the Rajah of Sattara.

Several petitions were presented against the admission of Jews into Parliament.

Mr. WAKLEY presented a petition from Lucy Williams, landlady of the Coach and Horses, public house, Drury-lane, complaining of a conviction of Mr. Jardine, fining her for selling a small quantity of spirituous liquor before one o'clock on a Sunday morning. The petitioner prayed that the House would appoint a Select Committee to make inquiries into the case, as it was one materially affecting the interests of the whole body of licensed victuallers.

ENGLAND AND ROME. Sir R. INGLIS asked Viscount Palmerston whether there was any truth in the report that a convention had been signed at Rome by the Earl of Minto, Lord Privy Seal, on the part of her Majesty, with cardinal —— the Sec of Rome?—Lord PALMERSTON said it was well known that his noble friend the Earl of Minto had been for some time in Rome, but he was not residing there in any public or official capacity. (Hear.) His noble friend was not invested with any powers or authority to negociate with or to enter into any convention with the Court of Rome. (Hear.)

THE JEWS.—In answer to a question by Mr. GLADSTONE, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, his noble friend Lord John Russell (certainly intended to bring in the bill of which he had given notice for removing the civil disabilities affecting the Jews on the day he had mentioned, viz., Thursday, the 16th inst. He believed the subject would be brought forward on that day.

COMMERCIAL DISTRESS.—Lord G. BENTINCK asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to postpone the nomination of the Committee to inquire into the causes of the recent commercial distress until next week.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, he had no objection to postpone the motion until Monday, but he was anxious that no unnecessary delay should take place in consecuting the inquiry. The appointment of the Committee was then postponed until Monday.

THE BUDGET. In answer to a question from Mr. EWART, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said he would state his views on the question of taxation w. on he brought forward the budget.—Mr. HUME: Can the right hon. gentleman inform the House when he intends to bring forward the financial statement? (Hear.) The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: I can only give a general answer. It will be after the Christmas recess. ("Hear," and laughter.)

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—We are happy to state that the health of Lord John Russell is so much improved that his Lordship will be soon able to resume his Parliamentary and official duties. His Lordship was much better yesterday. Lady Russell is considerably better.

It is with much pleasure we are enabled to announce that the Duchess of Richmond's illness has greatly abated, and that her Grace is now considered in a state of progress we sincerely hope will be independent.

MR. THOMAS FREDERICK ELLIOTT, the senior Commissioner of the Colonial Land and Emigration Board, has been appointed Joint-Assistant Under-Secretary of State for the Colonial Department, with Mr. Merivale. Mr. Murdock, who has been appointed a Commissioner in the place of Mr. Elliott, has been one of the senior clerks in the Colonial Office.

THE ADMIRALTY. We understand that Captain Alexander Milne, of the St. Vincent, son of the late distinguished flag-officer, Admiral Sir David Milne, G C.B., who was second in command at the Battle of Algiers, will be the new Lord of the Admiralty, in room of Rear-Admiral Bennett, C.B., who has been appointed to succeed the late Rear-Admiral Shirref as Superintendent of Portsmouth Dockyard.

CONFIRMATION OF THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK.—The election of Dr. Musgrave, late Bishop of Hereford, to the Archiepiscopal See of York, was confirmed yesterday (Friday) by Royal Commission, in St. James's Church, Piccadilly. The Commissioners were the Bishops of Winchester, Exeter, Salisbury, Chichester, Ely, and St. Asaph. The ceremony immediately followed the reading of morning prayers. The confirmation was declared by the Bishop of Winchester, who having directed any opponents of the election to be called, and none appearing, was pronounced all such contumacious; and having received the certificate of the Archbishop's election by the Dean and Chapter of York, he duly confirmed the same by the authority of the Queen's letter. The new Archbishop then took the proper oaths and retired with the Commissioners.

THE SOCIETY FOR THE PROTECTION OF AGRICULTURE AND BRITISH INDUSTRY.—On Thursday, the annual meeting of this Society was held at the offices, 17, Old Bond-street, for the purpose of receiving the report of the committee on the present condition of the Society. His Grace the Duke of Richmond presided. Amongst the noblemen and gentlemen present were Lord Ingestre, M.P.; Mr. Stafford, M.P.; Mr. Cayley, M.P.; Mr. C. N. Newdegate, M.P.; Hon. H. Wilson; Rev. J. Linton; Messrs. Bell, Baker, Jonas, Warson, Wood, Holding, Nesaye, Thomas, Sant, Chaplin, &c. The chairman opened the meeting by briefly calling upon Mr. A. Stafford, M.P., to read the report, which, having been agreed to, the noble Chairman proposed the appointment of a Sub-Committee to carry out that part of the report which states, "that it is desirable that a Committee should be appointed for the purpose of considering the question of tenant-right: Mr. Newdegate, M.P., seconded the motion.—Mr. Jonas did not think that six months' notice was sufficient for a tenant to leave.—Mr. Baker, M.P., Mr. Stafford, M.P.; Mr. Cayley, M.P.; Mr. C. N. Newdegate, M.P.; Hon. H. Wilson; Rev. J. Linton; Messrs. Bell, Baker, Jonas, Warson, Wood, Holding, Nesaye, Thomas, Sant, Chaplin, &c. The chairman opened the meeting by briefly calling upon Mr. A. Stafford, M.P., to read the report, which, having been agreed to, the noble Chairman proposed the appointment of a Sub-Committee to carry out that part of the report which states, "that it is desirable that a Committee should be appointed for the purpose of considering the question of tenant-right: Mr. Newdegate, M.P., seconded the motion.—Mr. Jonas did not think that six months' notice was sufficient for a tenant to leave.—Mr. Baker, M.P., Mr. Stafford, M.P., said, on his estate he found a difficulty in getting tenants to take a lease; they told him that they would rather trust to him than to a lease. Several other gentlemen addressed the meeting, and the resolution was adopted; after which, a vote of thanks to the Chairman closed the proceeding.

A LEGACY of £25,000 has been left to the medical department of University College, London, by the late Dr. Holme, of Manchester.

BOW STREET.

THE EVOLVING EXHIBITION AT ENON CHAPEL, CLEMENT'S-LANE.—On Monday, the churchwardens of St. Clement Danes parish waited on Mr. Jardine, requesting his interference in putting a stop to the exhibition of a very offensive nature at Enon Chapel. They stated that the premises under the chapel, in which there are hundreds of coffins, containing heaps of bones, have lately been thrown open for the inspection of the public, and crowds of persons hourly congregate to view what they considered ought to be held more sacred. They were at a loss to know what motive Mr. Walker, a surgeon, of Drury-lane, could have in exposing such a nuisance. Mr. Jardine: Does Mr. Walker take money to admit persons into the vaults to view the bodies?—Applicants: Not exactly, but tickets can be procured at his house.—Mr. Jardine having promised to use every exertion in checking the nuisance, the deputation left the Court.—Mr. Walker shortly after came into the Court, and said that the statements made in his absence were substantially correct. No force of language could convey any i as of the scene of this abomination: the ex-minister of the place actually realised the sum of £951 in six years by the nominal interment of dead bodies in a space measuring 50 feet by 20 in width. The money received from the persons visiting the place was to be applied to the decent interment of the bodies. He assured the Court that he should devote his attention to the limiting the number of persons admitted to the vaults in future.

THE RECENT GALES.—The severe gale in the Channel on Saturday and Sunday last, has been attended in several instances with shipwreck and a loss of life that, it is feared, will be found to be considerable. On Saturday night a vessel was lost on the Goodwin Sands—no tidings of the crew. On the same night, the Sovereign Bay, the Addolorata, of and from Naples, which had sailed from the Thames on the Thursday previous, with a miscellaneous cargo, became unmanageable, and drove ashore. Most of the crew perished, and three men and a boy came ashore on a raft and were saved. The vessel and cargo are completely lost, and the former has gone to pieces. At Shoreham the gale was severely felt. At one period it almost could be said to have raged with the violence of a hurricane. To the northward of the Nore several losses are reported. About seven o'clock on Sunday morning, the master of the Diligence, belonging to Brightensea, near Wivenhoe, described two vessels which had foundered in the Swin, about half a mile from each other, on the south side of the Gunfleet, midway between the beacon and the sonth-west buoy; one, to all appearance, was a large, and the other a three-masted vessel. Farther northward on the Gunfleet were wrecked two other vessels—namely, the Alkion, from Sunderland, and the Birkgholm: both crews were saved.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT OSBORNE.

Her Majesty and the Prince take their usual early walk each morning in the vicinity of the Palace.

On Saturday, Viscount Palmerston arrived at the palace in the afternoon, on a visit to the Queen. His Excellency the Chevalier Bunsen also arrived in the evening from Town, on a visit to Her Majesty. The Chevalier Bunsen, Prussian Ambassador, Viscount Palmerston, and the Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay also left the Palace.

On Sunday, Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent arrived at the Palace at two o'clock in the afternoon, on a visit to the Queen, from her residence, Frogmore House, near Windsor. Her Royal Highness was attended by her Lady in Waiting and Sir George Couper, Bart. The Royal Duchess crossed from Gosport in the Fairy. The Royal Children took an airing in a carriage.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—On Thursday (last week), at three o'clock in the afternoon, in the parish church of Wickmere, Norfolk, by special license, was solemnised the marriage of Reginald Henry Nevil, Esq., to the Lady Dorothy Fanny Walpole, youngest daughter of the Earl and Countess of Orford.

CAMBRIDGE. Dec. 8.

At a Congregation holden this day the following degrees were conferred:—M.A.—Barry Girling, John Harries Thomas, Algernon Wodehouse, Grand Compounder, St. John's College. B.A.—Thomas Inman, Queen's College; James Bandinel, Magdalen College, and the same College has been granted a grace passed the Senate to authorise the admittance of John Dewson Gibson, B.A. (of Trinity College) to the degree of B.A. by Royal mandate.

Tuesday, Dec. 7.—No much has been made to get up a petition to her Majesty, deprecatory of the appointment of this Divine to the see of Hereford, has failed, the Vice-Chancellor and Council having refused to entertain it.

ADDRESS TO BISHOP MUSGRAVE.—An address has been voted by the Dean and Chapter of Hereford to Bishop Musgrave, on the occasion of his elevation to the Archbishopric of York. The address was presented on the 29th ult., and is expressive of the sense cate tained by the Dean and Chapter of the fitness of Bishop Musgrave for the high trust that has been imposed upon him, and of their joy at his elevation—tempered only by the sorrow they cannot but feel at the loss the diocese of Hereford is likely to experience at his removal from the Bishopric. Bishop Musgrave, in his reply to the address, thanks the Dean and Chapter cordially for the affectionate address presented by them, and expresses the conviction he feels, that the successful and happy administration of the diocese is due to the efforts less of himself than of those placed under him; and while he looks upon the higher sphere of action to which God has called him, he shall ever look back to the period of his life when he occupied the see of Hereford, with mingled pleasure and regret.

IRELAND.

MR. A. STAFFORD, M.P.—The Tipperary Vindicator says:—"There is no truth in the statement reported to have been made by the above gentleman in the House of Commons, that no one could be found to procure medical aid for Mr. Reply, the fact being that a man named Mara, exhausted from want, volunteered his services, and went for Dr. O'Neill Quin."

REPEAL ASSOCIATION. The weekly meeting was held as usual on Monday. A letter was read from Mr. John O'Connell, calling for an expression of public opinion on the course he had taken regarding the Coercion Bill in the House of Commons, and enclosing his own subscription of £10 towards the fund for defending the return of Mr. Reynolds for the city of Dublin. The rent for the week was £40.

AFFAIR OF HONOUR AT CORK.—On Wednesday, as the Aurora steamer came up to the quay at Cork, Mr. Hardy came on board and violently assaulted Captain Bunbury, of the 97th Regiment, by striking him across the face with a cane. The bystanders, who were all amazement, interfered, and, after a deal of abusive epithets heaped upon the gallant captain by the assailant, the parties retired. Informations having been lodged with the Mayor, to the effect that a duel was apprehended, Captain Bunbury and Mr. Hardy were arrested and compelled to enter into securities to keep the peace. The cause of the assault was said to be the non-fulfilment of a marriage-engagement made by Captain Bunbury, to Mr. Hardy's sister.—Major-General Bunbury, father of Captain Bunbury has published the following explanatory statement:—"The engagement of Captain Bunbury with the young lady in question was broken off by me, for the simple reason that my son had no money of his own, I had none to give him, and the lady had none. The result of the disappointment to the intimate, the gross misuse of towards him in a certain letter, written by a relation of the lady to the commanding officer of his regiment. Immediate y Captain Bunbury became acquainted with the letter, however, and demanded satisfaction; still on hearty enquiry and make such explanation as was due; the offensive expressions were withdrawn in writing, all parties expressed themselves satisfied, and there was an end of the matter. The facts of the assault on board the packet are, simply, that a very young man, a brother of the young lady, taking advantage of the bustle of the passengers disembarking, struck Captain Bunbury before he left the packet. The account of the assault reached the Mayor, who, before Captain Bunbury had any opportunity of taking proceedings against his assailant, had him arrested, and bound over in heavy recognisances to keep the peace, &c.—I. BUNBURY, Major-General."

FORTUNES of the country still continue in a very disturbed state.

DARING OUTRAGE.—The house of a farmer named Heffernan, at Ballysheean, near Newgarth, Tipperary, was attacked by a party of three men recently, who attempted to force an entrance, but without success. They then proceeded to fire several shots through the door and windows, and one of the ruffians endeavoured to get into the house through a window, but when he had half his body in he was struck by a servant man armed with a bill-hook. His companions then, seeing his perilous position, and the likelihood of his being captured, dragged him out and carried him off in a dying state. The objects of this daring outrage were, to rob Heffernan of his rent, amounting to £160, which he was to have paid next day, and to get possession of his fire arms, in both of which they were fortunately frustrated.

THE KILKENNY FORGERY CASE.—The case of "The Trustees of Evans's Charity against the Bank of Ireland," was tried on Friday, in the Court of Queen's Bench. It was an action to recover the sum of £2960 Government stock, which had been invested in the joint names of the trustees of "Evans's Charities," and which had been transferred to other parties without their authority, by means of forged powers of attorney, presented to the Bank by the trustees' late secretary, William Grace, who has since been convicted of forgery. Upon the trial of Grace, the Bank produced certain powers of attorney, under which the transfers were made. It had been urged on his behalf that the seal affixed to the power of attorney was the common seal of the trustees; and that, inasmuch as he had not put the names of any of the trustees to these documents, he was not guilty, and should therefore be acquitted; but the Court decided that the affixing of the seal amounted to forgery, and he was accordingly convicted. Under these circumstances the trustees called on the Bank of Ireland, which they considered had acted without due caution or inquiry upon forged powers of attorney, to replace the names of the trustees on the books as the owners of the stock, or otherwise to make good the amount to them. The Jury found for the defendants, with 6d. costs, regarding the trustees as guilty of neglect, and acquitting the Bank of all want of caution.

MURDER OF FOUR CHILDREN BY THEIR MOTHER, AND SUICIDE OF THE MURDERER.

BATH, Wednesday Night.—A most horrible tragedy has taken place in this city in the course of the afternoon, which has necessarily produced the deepest sensation, a wretched woman having cut the throats of four of her children, and then despatched her own life by the same dreadful means. The wretched creature is the wife of a jobbing brewer, named Ridout, occupying a small cottage adjacent to the Bradford canal-boat station. The husband had been absent the whole day, being at work on a neighbouring turnpike-road. A female named Sears, residing in an adjoining cottage, not having seen Mrs. Ridout or the children during the day, went to their dwelling for the purpose of making some inquiries about them, but on attempting to open the door found it was locked. On entry having been obtained, the wretched woman was found lying on the floor steeped in her own blood.

In an adjoining room were the lifeless bodies of four children, forming the family. Their heads were nearly severed from their bodies. A tub was standing in the room almost full of blood, evidently showing that the wretched mother, on making incisions in their throats, held their wounds over the tub to allow the blood to flow into it until life was extinct. The youngest child was an infant nine months old, and the eldest about six years of age. One of them was found with his legs partly hanging over a rosy leading to the back-door, as if he had struggled to escape.

The unhappy woman had been subject to frequent fits of insanity; but she had not been put under any restraint.

The inquests were held on Thursday, before Mr. A. H. English, Coroner, at the Crown Tavern, Bathwick, and were taken on the mother, Jane Ridout, and the four children, Fanny, George, William John, and Mark Ridout. The evidence adduced bear out the facts given above, and proved, in addition, that the mother had been afflicted under melancholia, and that, about two months since, she took her children to the water side, with the determination of destroying them and herself, but was deterred by their cries. The Jury, in the case of the children, returned a verdict of "Wilful Murder" against the mother; and in that of the mother, a verdict of destroyed herself during temporary insanity.

THE MURDER AND ROBBERY OF MR. BELCHAMBERS.—The prisoners, Thomas Sale, Thomas Doyle, George M'Coy, and John Davis, were on Thursday committed from Westminster Police Court, for trial on the above charge. Lloyd, against whom the evidence was not corroborative, was discharged., but, on leaving the body of the court, was immediately taken into custody on the Coroner's warrant.

THE WEATHER.

The weather during the past week has been stormy, very squally, and a heavy fall of wind from the S.W. has been blowing for a long time. The reading of the barometer has been remarkably low, and there has been a considerable change of temperature.

The following are some particulars of each day:—

Friday, the sky was overcast throughout the day, and rain was falling from 3h. P.M., till the end of the day; the direction of the wind was S.W.; the temperature of the air was high, its average was 48°. Rain fell to the depth of onefifth of an inch. Saturday, the sky was mostly free from cloud till morn, and it was chiefly covered by cloud after morn. Rain was falling occasionally during the evening, and with that which fell during the night, amounted to four-tenths of an inch in depth. A gale of wind began to blow in the evening from the S.W., and at times the gusts were heavy; the average temperature of the air for the day was 46°. Sunday, the gale of wind continued with more or less violence all day, and the readings of the barometer, which decreased nearly half an inch on Saturday, continued to decrease all day, and at midnight the reading was 29in. 3; the sky was variable in appearance till 11h. A.M.; and after this time it was cloudless, and continued so till nearly midnight, at which time the reading of a thermometer was 37°, and which afterwards increased; the average temperature for the day was 42°. Monday, the reading of the barometer continued to decline all day, and at midnight its reading was 28in. 4. The gale of wind continued, blowing hard from the S.W. and the S.S.W.; there were frequent heavy and prolonged gusts; the sky was mostly clouded till 4h. P.M.; the evening was clear. From 6h. P.M. till midnight a great deal of lightning was seen in the E., S., and W., near the horizon, the sky was squally; and its average temperature was 47°. Tuesday, the reading of the barometer at about 2h. A.M. was 28in. 3—its lowest reading; and after this time it began to increase. (This reading is less than any since that in the memorable storm of January 13, 1845.) The morning was stormy, there were frequent squalls, and the wind blew strongly and more from the S.W. The sky continued nearly covered by cloud all day, and the wind subsided towards the evening; the day was cold; its average temperature was 40°. Wednesday, the sky was mostly cloudless all day and evening; the wind was S.W.; the barometer reading reached 29in. early in the morning, and it was 29in. 6 at about noon; the day was very cold; its average temperature was 36½°, at 8h. P.M. the reading of the barometer was 29in. 31½; it began to increase by 9h. P.M., and at midnight it was 30°, and it continued to increase throughout the night; and at 7h. A.M. on Thursday it was 50°. Thursday, the sky was clouded all day; the wind was blowing strongly from the S. early in the morning, and soon rainfell; the direction of the wind was S.W.; at noon the reading of the thermometer was 59°, being 53½° higher than it was the preceding evening, and the average temperature for the day was 49°, and that for the week was 44½°.

The extreme thermometrical readings for each day were:—

The reading of the barometer this week has been lower, as stated above, than any reading since January 13, 1845. In the remarks on this storm by Mr. Glaisher, of the Greenwich Magnetical and Meteorological Observatory for 1845, p. 266), are the following notes on the low reading of barometers: "On January 13th, at 0h. 53m. P.M., the minimum reading took place, being 28in. 096, a reading lower than has been registered at this Observatory since 1821, December 25, at 5h. A.M.; when its reading was 27in. 85, as registered in the Greenwich Observations. The previous instances at Greenwich, in which these low readings appear to have been approached, are in 1783, on March 6th, when, at the meridian passage of the sun, the reading was 21in. 22; and at 2h. 30m. afterwards, at the meridian passage of the moon, it was 28in. 37. The next instance was in 1809, on December 17th, at 9h. P.M., when, at the meridian passage of the moon, the reading was 28in. 20. In Dr. Maskelyne's MS., Meteorological Observations at noon the next day, December 18th, the reading recorded was 28in. 35. The next case is the one previously mentioned in 1821, on Christmas Day; and the next case is in Mr. Fonk's MS., Meteorological Observations in 1824, on November 23d, at 5h. P.M., when the reading was 28in. 37."

PUBLIC HEALTH.

THE CHOLERA.—The Asiatic cholera, as predicted in 1832, has never quite left this island. In a mitigated form it has still presented itself here and there as if to warn us of the liabilities we were under The epidemic now raging is said, on good grounds, to be sometimes the precursor of cholera; as if either the "influenza" paved the way for the attacks of a still more serious foe, or the same conditions which induced the one brought on the other. It has not, indeed, usually or frequently preceded the cholera, but it has at least come; and the cholera is now known to be advancing towards us across the continent of Europe. We are informed that there have been several unmistakeable cases in the metropolis during the past week. Should it appear we are about to be visited by a scourge which has this year affected Europe more by a remembrance of the past than by its actual inflictions, we do sincerely hope that no panic feeling will disturb the humanity of the British public, and that the most effective precautionary efforts that ought forthwith to be made. For the wealthy, and healthy, and happy, the metropolis is as safe a place as any in these islands. The lady of fortune, in the midst of conservatories, gardens, lakes, and groves, is not more safe from the pest than in the dry and airy regions of the "West-end." In 1832 not a few fled into danger, when they might have stayed at their posts in safety. But hope something will be done, and that in time, to check the approach of an inscrutable foe, which it is impossible to drive away when it has once gained a footing on the soil. Everybody must remember how belated and bullied we were in 1832. Fifteen years, half a generation, has passed, and are we now better prepared?—Times.

THE PREVAILING EPIDEMIC.—We regret to state that the influenza, so far from subsiding, is rather on the increase, owing, no doubt, to the unfavourable state of the weather. There has been considerable illness prevalent in the Royal Household, and in the Royal Military School, at Chelsea. In some cases the malady has proceeded from ward to ward in succession. As is characteristic of the malady, death appears to result only when the constitution has been previously debilitated, or when carelessness or neglect is exhibited.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—The Registrar-General's return for the week ending Saturday, the 4th inst., is big with the fate of 2454 inhabitants of the metropolis, and bears a melancholy testimony to the ravages of an epidemic which is not dreaded so much as cholera and other malignant forms of disease, only because it is not so fatal in proportion to the amount of sickness which is produced. This enormous amount of mortality exceeds the average by no less than 146, or 184 per cent. The total number consists of 1141 males and 1313 females, and is thus distributed over three periods of life:—1012 under 15 years; 112 from 15 to 60 years of age; and 730 at 60 and upwards. The following summary of returns for the last three weeks exhibits the principal causes of mortality and the rapid progress of the prevailing disease:—

	Weeks ending			Weekly Average of 13 yrs.
	Nov. 20	Nov. 27	Dec. 4
Total causes	1080	1677	2454	1041
Epidemic diseases	111	415	958	91
Diseases of the brain	152	173	231	157
Diseases of the respiratory organs	241	344	448	345
Diseases of the digestive organs	76	96	143	74
Measles	24	24	31	30
Scarlatina	59	41	53	44
Hooping-cough	24	41	50	32
Croup	22	20	19	38
Influenza	4	9	18	3
Typhus	136	243	309	99
Pneumonia	170	306	409	160
Total of last three diseases	160	462	847	151

The last total, namely 847, does not vary much from the highest amount which the weekly mortality from the same epidemic reached in 1833.

ANTIQUITY OF THE INFLUENZA.—Of this now universally prevailing malady we have met with a letter dated 1580, addressed by Sir Edward English Ambassador at the Court of Mary Queen of Scots, to Cecil (afterwards Lord Burleigh), dated Edinburgh, 30th November, 1582. "May it please your honour. Immediately upon the Queen's arrival here, she fell acquainted with a new disease that is common in this town, called The New Acquaintance, which passed, also, through her whole Court, neither sparing lord, lady, nor damsel, not so much as either Frenchman or English. It is a pain in their heads that leaves it, and a sore in their stomachs, with a great cough: it remaineth with some longer, with others shorter time, as it findeth apt bodies for the nature of the disease. The Queen keeps her bed six days: there was no appearance of danger, but many that die of the disease, except some old folks. My Lord of Murray is now presently in it; and I am ashamed to say that I have been free of it, seeing it seeketh acquaintance of all men's hands." The letter is printed at pp. 103-4 of the "Selections from Unpublished Manuscripts, illustrating the Reign of Mary Queen of Scots," presented to the Maitland Club, in the year 1837, by the late Mr. Kirkman Finlay, of Castle Toward.

SALE OF VALUABLE ENGRAVINGS.—On Tuesday, Messrs. Sotheby and Wilkinson, of Wellington-street, Strand, concluded a sale of a valuable collection of engravings. The value of the collection may be estimated by the following items:—"The Marriage of the Virgin," by Raffaelle, engraved by Longhi, £—; "La Madonna di Santa Sisto," engraved by Muller, a fine proof, £53; "The Little Gardeners," by Maddel, superb autograph proof, £17; "Sybilla Persica," early proof, by Forfoit, £12 12s; "The Virgin in Glory," after Murillo, by Fiquiere, proof before letters, £12 12s. The whole of the engravings were in the finest state, and the prices obtained for them remarkably high. The sale realised near £600.

ELECTION OF THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK.

On Wednesday, December 1st, in pursuance of her Majesty's writ of congé d'elire, the Election of the new Archbishop of York took place in the Chapter House of the Minster, which was crowded by the good citizens of York, to witness a ceremony the more interesting from the length of time which has elapsed since the last election. The brilliancy of the day added to the picturesqueness of the scene; the clear sunlight streaming in through the richly storied windows—

> "diamonded with panes of quaint device,
> Innumerable of stains and splendid dyes,
> As are the tiger-moth's deep damask'd wings"—
> (Keats)

and tinting pillar, arch, and pinnacle, with their

> "thousand heraldries,
> And twilight saints, and dim emblazonings."

The Choir of the Cathedral was hung with black, in memorial of the late Archbishop; and on the throne and pulpit were the escutcheons of his armorial bearings.

As the hour of ten, the time appointed for the commencement of the Election, drew near, the choir was filled with spectators, all anxious to view the peculiar ceremonies incident upon the appointment of an Archbishop. At that hour, the members of the Chapter, preceded by the Vergers and choristers, entered the choir; and, on taking their seats in the stalls, the service was commenced.

In the absence of the Dean, the Rev. W. H. Dixon, Canon in Residence, officiated as President; and, besides him, the following members of the Chapter were present:—The Ven. Stephen Creyke (Archdeacon of York), the Ven. Edward Charton (Archdeacon of Cleveland), the Rev. C. Hawkins (Canon Residentiary), the Rev. C. Johnstone (Canon Residentiary,) the Rev. Canon Coates, the Rev. Canon Cooke, the Rev. Canon Trevor, the Rev. Canon G. Dixon, the Rev. Canon Croft, the Hon. and Rev. Canon Duncombe, the Rev. Canon Hotham, the Rev. Canon Barnes, the Rev. Canon Wrightson, and the Rev. Canon Sharpe.

The Vicars Choral present were—The Rev. Dr. Stedman, the Rev. W. Rulmer, the Rev. E. J. Barnes, the Rev. W. H. Oldfield, and the Rev. W. H. Metcalfe, who officiated at the Lectern.

The Litany was first chanted; and then the hymn, "Come, Holy Ghost," was sung, the noble organ pouring forth its rich melody: at the conclusion of the hymn, the Chapter left the Choir, in procession, as they entered it, and proceeded to the Chapter House, and a general and somewhat hurried move of the congregation towards the same place instantly followed. The scene in the Chapter House was extremely striking. The apartment itself, an octagonal one, having a lofty groined roof, richly painted, and seven exquisitely beautiful stained glass windows, is, perhaps, one of the finest rooms of the kind in England; and, having been carefully restored within a few years, and a rich pavement of encaustic tiles laid down, it has an air of completeness and finish highly gratifying to the sight.

On the present occasion, a table covered with black cloth, was placed at the side of the octagon facing the doorway, and on it, pens and ink, and two candles; and an old-fashioned chair was placed behind it, as a throne for the President. At either end of the table was a seat for the members of the Chapter.

Barriers, covered with black cloth, were erected so as to form a passage for the Chapter to the table, and yet to allow room for the great number of spectators who thronged into the body of the Chapter House. Many persons ascended to the narrow gallery formed by the stone canopies, to the arcade round the room, and thence obtained an excellent view of the whole scene.

On entering the Chapter House, the members of the Chapter took their places on either side of the table, the President at the table, the Vicars Choral and Choristers standing behind; and then the formal proceedings of the day were begun by the Apparitor showing the citations, and making oath of their due execution. The Apparitor next went to the door of the Chapter House, and summoned the members of the Chapter, and those not present were pronounced contumacious by the President. These preliminaries having been gone through, Mr. C. A. Thiselton, the Registrar, read the writ of congé d'elire, and the Queen's letter to the Dean and Chapter, recommending the Right Rev. Dr. Musgrave, to be by them elected to the vacant Archiepiscopal See of St. Peter's at York. The President, in obedience to the Queen's then proposed Dr. Musgrave, and the Chapter having signified their acquiescence by holding up of hands, this consent was duly set forth in writing, read, and signed by the President. The election thus made, the members left the Chapter House in procession as they entered, and went to the nave of the Cathedral, where the President read aloud the statement of the Election, and all again returned to the Chapter House.

It was then ordered that the Election be signified and certified to the Queen and Archbishop elect, and Proctors were appointed for that purpose.

A procession was then again formed, and the Chapter proceeded to the choir; and, as they entered under the magnificent arch of the organ screen, they halted, and the President, turning towards the spectators assembled in the nave, read or published the Election again. When the members of the Chapter had taken their seats in the stalls, the service was resumed, and the "Te Deum" (from Naresi, in F,) was sung, the President giving out the first words, after which, he read the prayers for the Queen and Clergy, which terminated the service.

The Chapter once more, marshalled as at first, proceeded to the Chapter House, when the necessary instruments were publicly read, and decreed to be sealed; and the Chapter having adjourned to the vestry for that purpose, they were then sealed with the common seal; and thus terminated the ceremonials observed in electing the Archbishop of York.

After the Election, the bells of the Minster rang out a merry peal.

THE ELECTION IN THE CHAPTER-HOUSE.

THE SMITHFIELD CLUB PRIZE CATTLE SHOW.

MR. FOLJAMBE'S SOUTHDOWN.—EXTRA STOCK.—SILVER MEDAL.

MR. HITCHMAN'S CROSS-BRED SHEEP.—1ST PRIZE, £10.—CLASS XII.

This annual exhibition commenced on Wednesday; when the wintry and out-of-season quiet of Baker-street was broken by the incessant arrival of visitors of every grade—from the nobleman in his coroneted carriage to the plebeian in a "threepenny omnibus."

"The Cattle Show," as it is termed par excellence, may be regarded as a sort of agricultural carnival, in which thousands of landed proprietors and graziers are interested; independent of which, the in-dwellers of our vast metropolis consider it as a special "sight," doubtless, in association with the supply of the two hundred and eighty millions of pounds of animal food the annual consumption of "the modern Babylon."

The Smithfield Club, as many of our readers are, doubtless, aware, "consists of noblemen and gentlemen, of extensive landed possessions; and was established at the close of the last century, when the improvement of the rural arts was looked upon as a patriotic duty." The Annual Show of prize cattle, sheep, pigs, &c., takes place a fortnight previous to Christmas; so that the sight has a sort of seasonable and domestic attraction—fat oxen and Christmas cheer being closely associated in the minds of the English people; though "the roast beef of old England" can boast but of two centuries' antiquity.

However, the Smithfield Club is an institution of the last fifty years, when Agricultural Societies first became the fashion of the day. The Exhibition was originally held in a close yard in Goswell-street; but, some seven or eight years since, it was appointed to take place at the Horse Bazaar, King-street, Portman-square; better known to the miscellaneous public as the locus in quo of Madame Tussaud's waxen galaxy. The removal was, at first, considered injudicious; but, it has, unquestionably, heightened the respectability as well as the number of the visitors; and has thus made the Exhibition of general, instead of class interest. In our Journal we have chronicled and illustrated the wonders of the Show of the last five years: artistic ingenuity has given to each an individual attraction; and our annual placard of the painted bull has, we trust, raised no expectation which the Number of the week has not fully realised; an interest which, it is inferred, characterises the present sheet.

The routine of the Show has been more than once described in our pages. The arrangements are very complete, and place the judgment of the Club Committee, and Mr. Brandreth Gibbs, the Honorary Secretary, in a very praiseworthy light. Preps. story to the Exhibition, there are "reception days" for the Prizes, which are brought here from steam-boat wharves, and railway stations. We read of a late Show, "that the Scotch cows had, in some cases, been brought by steam-boats a distance exceeding five hundred miles; and in nearly every case, the railways were made use of for both cattle and sheep, from all parts of England. Formerly, the animals were brought to London in vans, at a great expense, so the rate of travelling was necessarily slow." These advantages have been fully secured to the present Exhibition.

MR. MANNING'S OX.—1ST PRIZE, £30.—CLASS II.—AND SILVER MEDAL.

Science has thus, we see, done much to improve the Exhibition as regards conveyance of the objects; and we shall be enabled to prove how it has otherwise raised the character of the Show.

The improvement of the breeds of cattle and other stock, especially in diminution of cost, has now become a prime object with our farmers and graziers, to maintain their ancient healthful and profitable contests. Formerly, fatness was regarded as the main object of the contest; and, many a prize medal has been bestowed for bulk, where it should have been conferred for excellence of breed In time, the Smithfield Fat Cattle became busts for the wits of the day; and, your fat ox yielded many a fine subject for the pencil of Cruikshank, and other graphic humorists. Sometimes their vast size reminded one of Virgil's steer

> "His bulk no weight for his thighs is grown,
> And his unwieldy neck hangs drooping down."

How different, too, was the fare of your fattened ox from that of the poet's kine.

> "he never supp'd in solemn state,
> Nor undigested feasts did urge his fate;
> Nor day to night luxuriously did join,
> Nor surfeited on Campanian wine.
> Simple his beverage, homely was his food;
> The wholesome herbage and the running flood,
> No diseases gluttonous fed him with affright,
> His pains by day secured his rest by night."

"Ridicule," which "is the itch of our age and climate," has, doubtless, had its weight in abating the error of breeding monster oxen; though, it is but fair to infer that the discussions of Liebig, Bousingault, R. D. Thompson, and other eminent chemists, on the dietaries best fitted for Cattle, have had their scientific share in contributing to this reform. "The science of breeding," says the Times, "must now take a more practically useful and economical direction, and Agricultural Societies will be much more advantageously employed in teaching the small farmer how to obtain certain given results with the least possible outlay, than in demonstrating, by means of their wealthier members, how much fat a monster ox can manage to live and groan under—without expiring."

"It must not, however, be supposed that," in the words of another contemporary, "the stimulus of prizes for bringing our animal breeds to a state of unnecessary fatness is altogether a work of supererogation; but, the power of reaching this point is simply a test, showing the capacity of the breed for acquiring, at the least expense of food, and at the earliest age, such a useful machinable condition as the public demand requires."

In the Show of the present year, the Judges have not uniformly awarded the prizes to the fattest and heaviest beasts; and there are fewer overgrown animals than last year, when the monster fattening was on the decline. The aim appears to have been rather to signalise the healthy state of the stock, and the attainment of "a due and profitable proportion of flesh and fat with the least expense to the grazier."

The arrangement of the Exhibition is as heretofore: it is well ventilated, and at night, lighted by gas.

Before we give the official list of awards, we shall say a few words upon

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

These are a selection from the finest animals, commencing on our front page, with a Heifer bred and fed by the Earl of Radnor, at Coleshill, Berkshire, to which the first prize of £20, Class 7, has been adjudged; with the silver medal to the breeder. This heifer is a cross between the Hereford and long-horn breeds, and has come so early to a ripe maturity, that although only two years and eight months old she has carried off the prize against much larger animals of the five-year-old class. She has been fed on hay, corn, roots, and cake; and the total cost of her keep since she was calved has been £38 3s. She is sufficiently fat, although not so much so as many animals shown against her, and appears to be lively and in perfect health.

Upon the page with the above is engraved an Ox of the Cardigan breed, belonging to His Royal Highness Prince Albert, who has gained by it the prize of £10 in class 8. It is five years old, and has been fed on oil-cake, beanmeal, swedes, tares, and hay. The fat is not so much over-fed as freely distributed as upon the two animals last mentioned, but the back is broad and straight for the breed, and the animal is considered a very good one.

The two Sheep at the head of page 385, are fine specimens of their kind. Mr. Follambe's is a pure Southdown, shown as Extra Stock, for which the Silver Medal has been adjudged. For breadth of back and symmetrical beauty it is, perhaps, unequalled in the present Exhibition. Sheep is a cross-breed, between the Oxfordshire and Hampshire, at Little Milton: it has obtained a prize in Class 12

"The sheep are excellent, and the pens of Southdowns, in particular, will not fail to justify the preference given for these sheep in the London market. The Duke of Richmond has this year carried off the prizes for Southdowns over his well-known rival, Mr. Jonas Webb.

The three heads in the central line are of the finest specimens of their respective breeds.

In Lot lower range is engraved Mr. J. T. Smith's Heifer, to which was awarded the first prize of £20, Class 8. It was bred at Mornby Grange, near Galborough, Northampton.

The companion specimen is an ox, to which a prize of £30 and the silver medal of Class 2 were awarded; besides the gold medal as the best ox in the yard. This animal, bred and fed by Mr. Manning, of Rotherstorpe, near Northampton, shows an admirable development of the points and a style of carriage that indicate high health, without a single lump of superfluous fat. The back is extraordinarily broad and well shaped, and if the hind-quarters are not quite square and full enough to satisfy the connoisseur, the general merit of the animal will be held to entitle him to the prize. This steer was fed upon 2100lb. of oil-cake, 20 bushels of barley, 10 bushels of beans, carrots, hay, turnips, and mangel wurzel. Its age is four years and four months. It has been purchased by Messrs Prampton and Durning, of Blandford, Dorset.

"An ox of the North Devon breed has gained the prize in class 3, for the Earl of Leicester. It is a beautiful animal, well fed in every part, but with an appearance of fat, and entirely symmetrical. The number of oxen shown last year was 135, and the number at the present exhibition is 108. Although there is a falling-off in the quantity of animals exhibited, there is said to be a considerable and satisfactory improvement in their quality.

"The gold and silver medal for the best pen of pigs has been awarded to Mr. E. Whitfield, of Snaresbrook, Essex, for his improved Essex breed, which appear to have descended from the well-known stock of Mr. Fisher Hobbs. These interesting animals are only eighteen weeks old. They have been fed on 'middlings, barley, meal, and milk,' and do no discredit to such generous diet, the mere recapitulation of which would, no doubt, make many mouths water in Skibbereen. Another tender nursling of this family (the porcine), twenty-one weeks old, of the improved Essex breed, and fed on 'sweet hay,' by Mr. Pero, of Heston, extorted the silver medal from the judges as extra stock. His skin appears bursting, 'like a ripe gooseberry,' unable to retain the oleaginous and unctuous substance beneath; if you shake him walk, he screams; and with the most wilful air long after he lies down, like a spoiled child. An enormous pig, near this, of the Berkshire breed, bred by Mr. Pusey, is as large as a young Scotch bullock, and would weigh nearly two of these. A fat Sow, property of Albert has gained the first prize of £10, in class 17, for a pen of three pigs of the Bedford and Yorkshire breed. Their age is thirty-nine weeks, and they have been fed on barley-meal, and skim-milk. Another pen of pigs in the pen are fatter even than the Prince's, and have wonderful pretensions to blood and breeding, the blue veins being distinctly visible through their thin skins. These pigs are a cross between the Suffolk and Essex breeds. The spoilt Belvedere of the porcine family is said to be the Chinese pig, who is, unfortunately, unrepresented at the present Show. But, there are two pens of the improved Middlesex breed, shown by Mr. W. Barker, of Uxbridge, which always commands a high price in the London market.

"There are some fine Durhams and short-horns among the extra stock."

THE IMPLEMENTS.

The Show of Implements and Machinery, Seeds and Roots, in the gallery of the building, proved very attractive: indeed, we do not remember it to have excited such general curiosity. We have engraved and described a selection of the most striking implements in another page; so that we shall here merely say a few words upon the general character of the department.

At the time of our visit, the gallery was crowded with visitors; and many of the machines being put in motion, the effect was very singular. Here a Chaff Machine was cutting at the rate of forty bushels per hour; and there a Tile machine seemed gifted with almost automaton facility of production. The Patent Economical Hand Dibble, exhibited for the first time here, attracted many visitors: with this machine, one man can dibble from six to ten acres a-day; by lifting up a lever, it advances in a straight line, to admit of hoeing; by pushing down the lever, the seed is deposited, and it then advances as before; it deposits the seed at equal distances, and uniform depth, making the holes as small as possible, not to admit water, easily closed up, and, as it were, sealed hermetically in the earth; whilst the inventor professes, by this dibble, to make one bushel of seed go as far as three. A Self-registering Drainage Level was also repeatedly inspected: by this instrument, the farmer can tell immediately what the rise or fall is of the bed or bottom of a drain or gutter, and, as well as between two given points; these results not requiring to be calculated, but are afforded by the scale of the instrument.

Some of the roots were of prodigious size; and a few of the cabbages were suited for a Brobdignag kitchen.

The novel glass manufactures—one of the results of the relaxed tariff were also attractive. Here were glass milk-pans, rolling pins, cucumber and grape glasses, bee glasses, glass butter-pots, flower-pots, and preserve jars, glass tiles, and oily named "glass slates;" besides a long array of lactometers. A together, the display was an extremely interesting one. The large Show room at the end of the gallery is now occupied by Mr. Apsley Pellatt's tasteful display of glass and porcelain, the contiguity of which to so much bovine life irresistibly led to the reminiscence of "a bull in a china-shop."

We now append the authorised List of the awards:—

OXEN OR STEERS.

CLASS I.

The first prize of £30 to No. 17, viz., to his Grace the Duke of Rutland, of Belvoir Castle, Grantham.

The silver medal to the breeder is awarded to his Grace the Duke of Rutland.

The second prize of £15 to No. 3, viz., to Mr. Joseph Stratton, of Manningford Bruce, near Pewsey, Wilts.

The third prize of £10 to No. 6, viz., to the Right Hon. Lord Portman, of Bryanston, near Blandford.

CLASS II.

The first prize of £30 to No. 23, viz., to Mr. W. D. Manning, of Rothersthorpe, near Northampton.

The silver medal to the breeder is awarded to Mr. W. D. Manning

The second prize of £20 to No 31, viz., to Mr. I. Taylor, of Monkmoor, Shropshire.

The third prize of £10 to No. 21, viz., to Mr. W. Trinder, of Wantage, Berkshire.

CLASS III.

The first prize of £15 to No. 40, viz., to Mr. J. S. Bult, Dodhill-house, Kingston, near Taunton.

The silver medal to the breeder is awarded to Mr Bult

The second prize of £10 to No. 37, viz., to the Right Hon. Lord Portman.

CLASS IV.

The first prize of £10 to No. 49, viz., to Mr. John Wippell, of Brenton, Devon.

The silver medal to the breeder is awarded to Mr. Wippell.

The second prize of £5 to No. 48, viz, to Mr. T. W. Fouracre, of Durston, near Taunton.

CLASS V.

The prize of £10 to No. 54, viz., to the Right Hon. the Earl of Leicester, of Holkham, Norfolk

The silver medal to the breeder is awarded to the Earl of Leicester.

CLASS VI.

The prize of £10 to No. 64, viz., to H. R. H. Prince Albert, Windsor Castle.

The gold medal, for the best ox or steer in the 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 classes, is awarded to No. 29, viz., to Mr. W. D. Manning, of Rothersthorpe, Northampton.

COWS AND HEIFERS.

CLASS VII.

The first prize of £20 to No. 75, viz., to the Right Hon. the Earl of Radnor, of Coleshill, near Faringdon.

The silver medal to the breeder is awarded to the Earl of Radnor.

The second prize of £10 to No. 71, viz., to Mr. J. L. Hassall, of Packington, near Ashby-de-la-Zouch

The third prize of £5 to No. 84, viz., to Mr. H. Frampton, of West Challow, near Wantage, Berkshire.

CLASS VIII.

The first prize of £20 to No. 86, viz., to Mr. J. T. Smith, of Thornby-grange, near Guilborough, Northampton.

The silver medal to the breeder is awarded to Mr. J. T. Smith.

The second prize of £10 to No. 85, viz., to Mr. W. Trinder, of Wantage, Berkshire.

CLASS IX.

The first prize of £15 to No. 100, viz., to Mr. T. Penson, of Foxcote, near Chipping Norton.

The silver medal to the breeder is awarded to the executors of the late Mr. W. Harbidge.

The second prize of £5 to No. 99, viz., to Mr. T. Yates, of Sapperton, near Sudbury.

The gold medal for the best cow or heifer in the 7, 8, and 9 classes is awarded to No. 76, viz., to the Right Hon. the Earl of Radnor, of Coleshill, near Faringdon.

LONG-WOOL SHEEP.

CLASS X.

The first prize of £20 to No. 113, viz., to Mr. J. Painter, of Burley, near Oakham.

The silver medal to the breeder is awarded to Mr. Painter.

The second prize of £10 to No. 112, viz., to Mr. T. Twitchell, of Willington, Beds.

The third prize of £5 to No. 110, viz., to Mr. J. S. Burgess, of Holme Pierrepoint, near Nottingham.

CLASS XI

The first prize of £20, to No. 122, viz., to Mr. T. Twitchell, of Willington, Beds.

The Company, at the Exhibition on Wednesday, began to arrive before nine o'clock, when there was a goodly assemblage of farmers, graziers, and butchers in the yard: after that hour, the general public began to flock in, and before noon, the Exhibition was, as usual, densely crowded. The Duke of Richmond, the Marquis of Exeter, Lord Portman, the Earl of Warwick, the Earl of Radnor, Major-General Wemyss, Mr. Pusey, M.P., and a great many leading agriculturists, visited the "Show" during the early part of the day. The noble President of the Club was warmly congratulated on the successful awards obtained by the Goodwood stock; and the Marquis of Exeter and the Earl of Radnor came in for a full share of compliments. At twelve o'clock the anniversary meeting of the Club took place in the committee-room. The chair of Richmond presided, and was supported by Lord Portman, Mr. Pusey, M.P., and a large body of members The business transacted was merely of a routine character, and possessed no feature of public interest. Mr. B. T. Brandreth Gibbs, honorary secretary to the Club, was in attendance. The sale of stock during the day was unusually brisk

On Thursday the Show was honoured by a visit from the Duke of Cambridge, who was received and conducted through the yard by Mr. B. T. Brandreth Gibbs, the honorary secretary to the Club. His Royal Highness repeatedly made remarks on the general improvement exhibited in the breed of the cattle, and expressed his conviction that the Show of this present year exceed any previous one in that respect. An adjourned meeting of the Club took place, under the presidency of the Duke of Richmond, at which, after the re-election of his Grace as president, and the other officers, it was resolved, for the future, to do away with restrictions with respect to the feeding of the cattle. A committee was also appointed to alter the mode of distributing the prizes. The sales of stock effected throughout the day were more numerous than on the previous one, and it is stated that some of the cattle fetched exceedingly high prices. The bazaar was much more fully attended than on the previous day, scarcely less than 15,000 persons having passed through it.

FINE ARTS.

THE PRIZE CARTOONS; from the Eleven Designs to which the Premiums were awarded by the Royal Commissioners on the Fine Arts, in the year 1843. Engraved on stone, from the reduced drawings made by JOHN, JAMES, and WILLIAM LINNELL: Longman and Co.

The work is characterised in the Dedication, as the first fruits of the exertions of the Royal Commissioners "to develope a high branch of art hitherto uncultivated in this country." Viewed in this light, the result is highly indicative of the artistic genius of the British School "for designs of elevated character on a grand scale;" the majority of the successful competitors being young in their art, and their productions no. only in themselves of a high order of merit, but abundant in promises of further excellence. The "Prize Cartoons" were, therefore, in every respect worthy of such commemoration as they have received in the splendid work before us.

Of the merits of the Exhibition we spoke, at some length, at the date of its opening, in the No. of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for July 8, 1843. At the same time we detailed the treatment of the events chosen by the several artists; and characterised their Cartoons as "nobly conceived, and magnificently treated." It will, therefore, on the present occasion be only requisite for us to say a few words as to the skill with which the eleven compositions have been reduced and lithographed in the present work; and, by way of refresher, to glance at the incidents illustrated.

Each of the subjects measures 22 by 16 inches, dimensions sufficiently important to preserve the grandeur of the several compositions.

First, we have Mr. Armitage's Caesar's First Invasion of Britain, engraved by J. T. Linnell. The reduction must have been a work of great labour; the reader will, probably, recollect the original display of anatomical drawing in the grand nudes of the desperate resistance of the half-clad Britons to the Romans in their attempted landing. It is, indeed, a startling scene of muscular energy, filling three-fourths of the picture, and the decided outline of the figures, with the skilful use of light and shade indispensable in so elaborate a composition—and which were so much admired in the Cartoon, have here been admirably preserved by the engraver. The birds are the very relics of the Cartoon.

As a specimen of the mastery of difficulties and powerful grasp of delineation, this work is, perhaps, foremost of the Series; its elevated style of composition and design, as well as its costume and detail, are very striking: the scene, too, is one of the most impressive in our early history.

Mr. Watts's Caractacus Led in Triumph Through Rome, engraved by John Linnell, has appropriately succeeded the preceding sketch. The vanquished chief, the central figure in the picture, maintains his "dignity even in ruin," in affecting contrast with the gale of triumph danced by the lusty trumpeters, and the magnificence of Imperial Rome, in the arches and temples in the background. The individuality of the graceful British captives, and the stalwart Roman spectators, is also cleverly maintained. The engraver, in rendering Mr. Watts's effect, has been very successful. The Gothic character of the old school of the Caracts; and, as we have before remarked, it may be regarded as an exact exponent of the principle laid down by the judges, viz., "precision of drawing, a treatment of drapery uniting the imitation of nature with a reference to form, action, and composition; and a style of composition less dependent on light and shade than on effective treatment."

Mr. Cope's First Trial by Jury, engraved by William Linnell, is next in the Series. The pure and forcible drawing has been closely kept. The variety of expression in the heads of the judge, the jurors, the witnesses, and the accused, in this genuine judicial court, is very fine, and characteristically Saxon: the story, so to speak, is well told, and most appropriately chosen for the embellishment, or rather illustration, of the walls of a chamber of our Legislature

Mr. Leslie's St. Augustine Preaching to Ethelbert and Bertha, engraved by James T Linnell, has been thought to lack power in its composition, though the individual figures are mostly vigorously drawn: St. Augustine and his attendants have greater breadth than is usual in the predecessors in the Series; the group of the listening King and Queen and their attendants, is not unpicturesque.

Mr. Bell's Cardinal Beaufort and the Dowager Queen of Edward IV., has been rendered with all the breadth and power of the original, by N. Fleserzyski, under the superintendence of Mr. Gruner. As an historical composition, this picture is unrivalled in the Series: the resistance of the Queen to the importunity of the Cardinal, the reluctance of the boy Prince, and the sympathy of the attendants, are powerfully expressed: the composition of this group, too, is simple and natural in its character, and the management of the subordinate figures very successful. It has, also, higher tone and finish than most of its companion pictures.

Mr. Townsend's Fight for the Beacon has been rendered by Mr. W. Linnell, with the "wonderful power and effect" of the original. The picturesqueness of the foremost combatants, and of the men who are firing the beacon, is very striking, and the entire subject is treated with great vigour and originality.

Mr. Egg's Una Alarmed by Fauns and Satyrs has been engraved by Mr. T. H. Maguire, and printed in a warm tint, very successfully. It is a composition of much poetic beauty, full of fine "Academic" drawing; but it is scarcely seen to advantage in a Series of Scenes from British History.

Mr. Parris's Joseph of Arimathea Converting the Britons is scarcely a more successful choice than the classic tableau of "Una." It has been effectively engraved by Mr. Maguire; but the overcrowding of the composition with figures and incidents, and episodal prettiness, mar the simple dignity which such a subject as the "Conversion," if properly treated, would possess.

Mr. Selous's Boadicea Harangueing the Iceni has been engraved by C. Stockmar, under the superintendence of Mr. Gruner, and printed in warm tint. Although many of the figures in this melée display great power, the variety, both in the male actors and the accessories, is strangely overwrought: the attitudes are endlessly multiform, and there are scarcely two weapons alike. The scene, accordingly, lacks grandeur, and disappoints; especially as the subject has become almost conventional by repeated treatment.

Mr. Bridge's Alfred Submitting his Laws to the Witan, has also been engraved by the same artist as the "Boadicea," but with better effect. This is a noble composition, in appropriate character, and harmonising with Mr. Cope's Trial by Jury. The scene of the great Saxon Council is a hall of massive architecture; the figures of Alfred and the listening wise men are striking, and the subject is effectively told throughout.

Mr. Severn's Queen Eleanor, engraved by John Linnell, jun., concludes the Series of Eleven Prizes. The subject is the well-known incident of the Queen sucking the poison from the wounded arm of her husband, afterwards Edward I. The scene is in the Holy Land, and the vegetation gives an agreeable variety to the picture. The composition is sweet; the figures are well drawn, and the work altogether meritoriously original.

To this recapitulation, we shall only add our anxious hope that the present publication may find its way generally into the embellished homes of the wealthy, so as to advocate the claims of British art to their patronage: and, with such fosrage, we have no apprehension as to the most successful results.

COUNTRY NEWS.

OPENING OF MILLS AND RESUMPTION OF FULL TIME.—Messrs. J. and T. Sparrow of Exnam Mill, Blackburn, employing upwards of 600 hands, for some weeks closed, and at other times worked three days, recommenced full time on Friday morning last week. Messrs. Jolliffe, Tuppin, and Co., Thredle Nez Mill, and Ewood Mill, employing about 1040 hands, for a short time back working 36 hours per week, commenced on the same day at 11 hours per day.

PERSONS WANTED.—At Richmond Barracks, Dublin, during the last week or ten days, illness existed in almost every second house, the inhabitants of which were allisted with gastric fever. Nearly a whole school of young ladies were lying ill at the same time, and after was scarcely a family which had not some of its members sick. It was not, however, until one death took place, and several were in imminent danger, that the cause of this extensive illness was discovered, when it proved to be owing to the poisoning of a spring which supplied the place, and whose waters had been imperceptibly poisoned by a sewer breaking into it, and so greatly vitiating their character as to cause gastric fever in every family using it! On being found out, the evil was soon remedied, but not before much mischief had been done, and the necessity both for a pure supply of water and an improved system of drainage shown.

INCENDIARISM.—Two destructive fires have, we already stated, occurred in the vicinity of Reading within the last few weeks—one at Kentwood farm, and the second at Mr. May's farm, in the same parish. Great alarm is just now felt in the vicinity of Aylesbury, where it is reported that an incendiary spirit prevails among the labouring population to a fearful extent. At Wendover, on the farm of Mr. Manning, a most destructive fire took place on Monday. The farmers in the neighbourhood are about to establish a night watch

A MOTHER COMMITTED FOR KILLING HER DAUGHTER.—During the week the village of Nutharton, near Dudley, has been in a state of painful excitement, arising from the deplorable occurrence of a mother killing her daughter, seven-teen years of age, by stabbing her in the side with a piece of red-hot iron. Deceased had been detected stealing pieces of iron to procure sweetmeats. About twelve o'clock on Monday she was at her wood's accused her of pilfering. More iron was missed, and she had something in her mouth which she was sucking. They both became very much excited, and the girl told her parent "that it was no use to deny it, for she had swallowed them." It is stated that she threw a piece of red hot iron at her, and, unfortunately, it penetrated the daughter's side to a fatal extent. In the course of an hour she expired At the inquest, Mr. Cooper, surgeon, deposed to the iron having entered under the right arm, and penetrated the lung. The Jury returned a verdict of "Manslaughter" against the mother, who was sent for trial at the ensuing assizes.

DEATH OF MR. MACNEVEN.—This gentleman died here with an accident of a serious character, on her passage from Glasgow to Dublin, by which she was compelled to take refuge in Ramsay, Isle of Man, not without considerable danger and difficulty. The Minerva steamer left Greenock at seven on Tuesday evening, and, about half-past two next morning, being off Portpatrick, her engines gave way with a violent crash, causing the decks above to split up, and straining the vessel so as to render her unmanageable. The bazaar was much more fully attended than on the previous day, scarcely less than 15,000 persons having passed through it. Ramsay Bay, whence, it is expected, she will be towed to Liverpool.

COLLIERY ACCIDENT. THREE LIVES LOST.—On Tuesday, Mr. Clark, Deputy Coroner, held an inquest at the Wheatsheaf public-house, New Hey, Butterworth, about three miles from Rochdale, on the bodies of John Rhodes, aged 19, James Whitehead, 30; and Joseph Crider, 18, coal-miners. On the day previous, they went to their work at Haugh Colliery, and when about 100 yards up the mine they were suffocated to death by the foul air which had come from some old works in the mine. The Jury returned verdicts of "Death caused by foul air, or the black damp."

CHAPTER IV.

UP TO THE HEIGHTS OF HEAVEN!

HOWEVER comfortable Reinhard might feel, now that he was alone, yet still his eye often turned to the door, as if his friend must enter.

From this time, Reinhard again takes his meals with the family; he now, for the first time, resumed his old position among them. He frequently talked with Lorle about his distant friend, and the circumstance of they two liking a person whom the old village either forgot or despised, gave a peculiar and secret charm to their intercourse. It now came out that the Sub-Librarian unquestionably had, in the deep excitement of his feelings, uttered some violent expressions of a peculiar character. He had said in the house of Klaus, the old and wretched peasant, that one might almost doubt of a Providence, since he could tolerate people building a church to him, whilst they calmly witnessed the misery of their brother man! Lorle excused him always to the utmost extent, and lamented that the people to whom he had done nothing but good, had now slandered and betrayed him to the clergyman. She herself could now scarcely enjoy either repose or pleasure; she employed herself in going through the whole village, and rendering aid where it was needed. Reinhard, too, was extremely industrious.

Lorle spent much of her time in the village, and but little at home; she was principally with the mother of Wendelin, who was just now confined with her sixth child, a boy. Reinhard had painted-in his picture hastily, and wished now to rest while the colours dried; that is, he wished to enjoy a ramble in the woods and fields. He cleaned his gun, therefore, that he might make it his companion.

Reinhard made this attempt to raise himself out of his dreams; he joined in the chase, and this demanded a concentrated and resolute state of mind, and fixed his eye upon the outward.

One day about noon, he returned with his gun on his shoulder, and a brace of moorcocks in the game bag; as he approached the house, he saw Lorle sitting under the linden tree, with a little brother and sister of Wendelin's. The youngest, a child scarcely a year old, was standing on her knee, and she was snapping her fingers, laughing, and singing to amuse it. The other, a little boy, stood at her feet, but was looking out of humour. Lorle nodded kindly to Reinhard as he came up, and then went on playing with the children, and singing to them.

Reinhard seated himself upon the trunk of a tree just opposite to Lorle, and fixed his eyes upon her; she let him do so, for she was accustomed to his often gazing at her in this way, so she merely inquired if Mr. Rehbenmaier would not write.

"No," replied Reinhard.

It was only with the simple monosyllable no, that he replied to her question; and yet there was an expression in the tone of his voice which the most affectionate words alone could not have conveyed. Suddenly the boy at Lorle's feet began to cry, saying at the same time, "I want to go home!"

"Stop with me," said Lorle, soothing him; "your mother is sleeping, and you cannot go home," and then pointing to a robin redbreast that hopped about before them, she said, "only look, what a white under-waistcoat that bird has got on; look at him when he flies away,—see!" The bird flew away, and they saw the white feathers under his wings.

Lorle and her auditors laughed aloud; they were children who were amusing themselves by, and with one another.

Reinhard went into his painting-room, and turned all his pictures and studies with their faces to the wall; he wished to see nothing but the one picture which he saw before his mind's eye.

In the evening, he had a long conversation with the Landlord; and, principally from the recollection of Reinhard's magnanimously giving up the promise made at the Valley Mill, was he now successful. At length the father called in his daughter, and said, "Lorle, Mr. Reinhard wants to paint you in his picture for the church; would you like it?"

"For the church?" asked she, looking around her and upwards, as if she were saluting some stranger existence beside and above her.

"Your mother will be at home after to-morrow," said her father, "during the whole week; we shall leave the thrashers here, and she can look after them, and also be with you. What do you say?"

"Yes," said Lorle, with a firm voice. In her own chamber, however, she wept and prayed through the whole night; she did not know rightly why, but she felt both glad and sorrowful at heart.

Reinhard, also, was very uneasy; and when he awoke with the first beams of the sun, he said aloud to himself, "Madonna-like! yes, he was right."

And now at length she sate by the easel.

"Don't you think that perhaps it is a sin?" asked Lorle, bashfully, casting down her eyes.

"No," replied Reinhard, once more, in that heartfelt tone, and Lorle looked cheerfully up: this simple assurance satisfied her perfectly

Her mother went in and out, whilst Lorle sate quietly there. At the beginning she was continually in the most painful state of embarrassment; and, when Reinhard intentionally made a joke, she asked, "May I, then, laugh also? May I talk too? Only just tell me, and I will not hinder you."

Reinhard assured her that she had nothing to do but to behave quite naturally.

Reinhard was obliged to put a restraint on himself to prevent his taking Lorle in his arms. Her mother came in: she held her hands close to her sides that she might not be tempted by astonishment to touch the wet picture: she could not, however, sufficiently wonder at the striking resemblance which it already bore to Lorle. It had been determined upon among them that nobody in the village should know anything about the affair before the consecration of the church.

How quiet and peaceful were now the hours which the two spent together. They heard, from the distant barn behind the house, the measured strokes of the thrasher's flail and, now and then, from the street, the crying of a child, the passing of a wagon, and then again all was quiet and soundless.

One day Lorle said, "I feel as if I should like not to be any longer in the village, or should like to go to sleep and only have everything in this way. I don't know how. I don't know, but I think I would not sit in this way for anybody else in the whole world."

"Good Lorle," replied Reinhard, "I know that you don't like anybody in the world as well as me. Don't tremble," continued he, taking her hand; "I know your whole life. Whilst I was wandering about at a distance, you were quietly thinking about me: it grieved you that I so often made fun of you, and yet you liked me: and, on the evening when I returned, you cried because everybody insulted me."

"For Heaven's sake, has Barbel betrayed that?" exclaimed she.

"Was it Barbel?" said he. "No, nobody told me that. It was for my sake that you were so kind to the Sub-Librarian; and, on that evening, when I sang the merry song, you listened quietly in your chamber whilst I remained below."

"Good Heavens! how do you know all that?"

"I know everything, because I love you so dearly. Do you, also, love me?"

"Yes, a thousand, thousand, times!"

The two embraced with a holy kiss.

"Now, now," exclaimed Reinhard, at length, "I would be willing to die, and you also."

"No," exclaimed Lorle, standing erect and holding Reinhard firmly; "first of all let us live long, long in this life!" There was an heroic strength in her glance, a proud decision in her bearing, as if she could conquer death.

"Then you will be mine for ever?" asked Reinhard.

"Yes, yes; in God's name I will be thine."

A peculiar sort of thrill seemed to pass through Reinhard's frame as she added that expression, in God's name. He fancied that Lorle did not resign to him her whole soul, and not with joyful exultation either. He did not consider that Lorle had struggled with herself, and that she humbly resigned herself to this love as one of the commands of God.

"What is it? Have I done something which is not right?" asked she, reading instantly the expression which marked his countenance.

"No, nothing."

"May I now go and tell this to my mother?" asked Lorle.

"No; stop here; we will keep this as a secret. Believe me, it is better that we should do so."

"Yes, yes," said she timidly; "I will willingly do everything. Only do you always advise me to do what is right, good Reinhard."

"You must be very kind to me," continued Lorle, laying her hand upon Reinhard's shoulder, "else I shall die of grief. I know that I am not good enough for you; I am of too low a rank."

Who can relate now all the sweet conversation and the affectionate embraces that after this day took place in Reinhard's otherwise quiet painting-room?

Lorle displayed in humility the plenitude of her abundant affection, whilst Reinhard stood amazed and adoring before her, and the conclusion of his conversation almost always was, "Oh God! I am not worthy of you!"

"You are a million times better than I am—better than any man, or anybody at all," Reinhard exclaimed, "and I would willingly serve seven times seven years for thee."

"Then you would be an old man," Lorle said, quietly smiling, and Reinhard continued without interruption:—

"Lorle, I have many a time forgotten both myself and the whole world—have indulged in intoxication—have been a sinner in the midst of remorse—but you cannot imagine how I have sunk."

"I can imagine everything, only tell me about it quietly."

"Oh! then beloved one," replied Reinhard, "take care of thyself with me; I have never yet had a friend of my heart whom I have not wounded; the Sub-Librarian is the only one who has remained faithful to me. I often lay up a store of sorrow for those to whom I ought only to be good and kind. It is only since I have seen you, since I have been yours, that I have looked back upon the old Waldemar, and he is a good-for-nothing fellow, not fit to touch the hem of your garment. I can make you happy, as no woman on earth ever was—and infinitely unhappy!"

Lorle wept large tears; but she soon dried them again, and said, "I have nothing but love for you; from here you look a deal better than you say"—with these words she pointed to her eyes; "and," added she, pouting her lips, "I cannot bear that anybody should abuse Reinhard, and you must not do so either. And now—only do not make me proud come here; we will be kind and good one to another, and God will help us."

"Yes, you make me once more quite pious," said Reinhard, and stood before her with folded hands

The picture proceeded vigorously; Lorle always exhorted to industry, and Reinhard also asked her not to let him become lazy.

Nobody in the house surmised anything about the new turn which things had taken: Vronl alone was taken into their confidence; and now, therefore, they often went to the mill. The two lovers were as joyful as children when they played at hide and seek in the wood.

The picture was nearly finished: the two lovers spoke of everything, excepting of the future; they both of them in the innermost of their hearts feared this; Reinhard, because he did not know what form it would assume; and Lorle, because she felt how painful it would be to rend herself from the parental home.

Reinhard now allowed himself to take some recreation, as for the last several days he had been much excited. He walked thoughtfully along the valley. It was evening; the mowers were busy cutting the dewy latermath; the withering grass diffused a fragrant odour. All at once, an anxious thought fell upon his heart; now, immediately, in the full bloom of their young love, he wished to call Lorle his own: and yet his future prospects were so uncertain. he cast, however, this anxiety from him; he determined to enjoy the day; the passing moment, and what will not a young heart accomplish in the open air? For awhile, forgetting himself, he watched the gnats, which, in the evening hour, were now abroad seeking for food; now, they buoyed themselves perfectly still in one spot in the air, as if hanging on a ray of evening light; their wings moved rapidly at their sides like light, airy wheels, till, as if impelled forward, they moved on; they had taken an almost invisible bouty, and now again paused in another spot. The sounds of day grew ever more and more silent; a gentle, nocturnal whispering was breathed through twig and grass. Reinhard wandered still farther onward; a song passed through his mind; he know not what; his mind was in a state of pensive delight.

When Reinhard, late in the evening, came home, he found a letter from the city; it was from the Sub-Librarian.

MUSIC.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Paris, Wednesday.

The great event has been the début of Alboni, as Arsace in Rossini's "Semiramide," at the Théâtre Italien, on Thursday last. She repeated the character r, Saturday and Sunday, and in all probability will be sung to three times in the week, such has been the extraordinary demand for places. As high as 150 francs (£6) was paid for a single stall last Thursday, and every seat was secured at the Bureau de Location, for four successive representations, this day week. It may be judged that the triumph of the great contralto has been complete. A greater success in fact, is not on record. The partisans of the Académie Royale de Musique are furious at Alboni's acceptance of M. Vatel's engagement after her brill ant reception at the French Opera, but I think she acted wisely in rejecting the Gallic repertoire, although it might have been to better taste, if she had abstained from returning to Paris, the present season, after the handsome treatment she had experienced at the Académie. It was curious on her first night to watch the Parisian amateurs. They were evidently sulky, and would not give Alboni a hand on her first entrance; but after a few notes from her divine organ, the expression of delight was not to be resisted, and from that moment the furore was unbounded. She was very badly dressed, a huge black mantle having been thrown over her shoulders; making her look, as Florentino remarked, like the Bœuf Gras at the Carnival. The two duos with Grisi, and the cavatina, "Is it barbara," in the second act, were immensely applauded; and there was no end to the ovations. Great as was the triumph of Alboni, that of Grisi, in "Semiramide," was still greater. Never did she sing and act so magnificently. I saw Meyerbeer and Lablache in ecstacies, applauding the two great artistes with the utmost energy. With the exception of Tagliafico, in Fresel, the remainder of the cast was very inefficient. The tenor, Collini, was intolerable; and Coletti barked through the florid divisions of Assur distressingly, his fine voice only being heard to advantage here and there in a bit of cantabile. There was no military band on the stage, and the costumes were very shabby. The scenery of Ferri and Verardi was, however, very well painted. The chorusses and band, as usual, were very indifferent. Alboni will shortly appear in "Cenerentola" and "La Donna del Lago."

I have perused with no little astonishment the letter of Miss Birch in the London papers. Are there two Miss Birches? Is there one in Paris and one in London? Certainly the Miss Birch of the Académie Royale can be no relation to the Miss Birch of Drury Lane. However, I presume as the English prima donna is quite satisfied with the treatment she experienced as the French prima donna, it is not for the journalist to disturb such delightful harmony; but truth before everything; and I cannot consent that one of your contemporaries should presume to designate my communications on this subject as "silly cry and little wool." I repeat distinctly, and despite of every contradiction—whether it have emanated to secure a favourable reception for a French prima donna to sing in English, or to arrange amicably an action for damages—that every fact published in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS respecting the scandalous treatment of Miss Birch in Paris, has been correctly stated, and, if necessary, could be authentically established by undeniable evidence. Her cause was taken up by disinterested champions, on purely national grounds; and Miss Birch's own version of the scene of the rehearsal is sufficient evidence of the "dead set" made against her in this centre of civilization.

Cerito and St. Leon having left for Venice, Carlotta Grisi has returned from Brussels, and reappeared in the "Diable à Quatre," with great glory. There is nothing new at the Opera Comique and Opera National. The new opera of "Haidée," by Auber, is preparing at the f rmer, and one by Adolphe Adam at the latter. The latter is composing the music of the new ballet, "The Five Senses," for Carlotta Grisi.

The German papers describe Alboni's triumph, at Pesth, last month, in Orsini in "Lucrezia Borgia," and Gondi in "Maria di Rohan." She sang, also, at a concert in Pesth. At Vienna she sang, on the 20th ult., at the An der Wien Theatre, with prodigious success, the "Obe faro" of Gluck, the cavatina of "Niobe," the "Non più mesta" from "Cenerentola," and the Drinking Song from "Lucrezia." At Prague, during the winter, the following new operas will be produced: "Blanda," by Kalkwoda; "Bianca et Guiseppe," by Reitel, the Director of the Conservatorium; and the 1st "Siege of Brigade," by Becker. Balfe's "Bohemian Girl" was also to be represented. Mdme. Pauline Garcia Viardot, after a series of triumphant representations at the Dresden Grand Opera, has left for Hamburgh.

EXETER HALL.—The Singing Classes under Mr. Hullah's direction, assembled for the first time this season on Monday last. The programme opened with Mendelssohn's 114th Psalm, "When Israel out of Egypt came," followed by Handel's "Acis and Galatea," the solo in the latter being sung by Mr. Lockey, Mr. Phillips, and Miss Stewart. Mr. Willy was the leader of the band. There was a good attendance, and the performance went off satisfactorily, Mr. Lockey particularly distinguishing himself in the "Acis" music.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"A. Z. B. Y."—The want of care exhibited by the constructors of Problems is certainly most annoying. For the avoidance of merely clerical errors, each man on the diagram should be designated as White or Black by the initial W or B. In future, we shall be compelled to refuse all positions where this precaution is not adopted. You are quite wrong in your solution of Enigma 237, and have not hit upon the author's mode of play in 235.

"A. X."—There is no mistake in Enigma 214. The Knight cannot move.

"H. W. F. C."—See our solution in the last Paper, headed "Solution to Problem No 200."

"J. B. H."—There is no possibility of effecting mate in Problem 200 as you suggest. In Problem 199, the first move should be R takes R (ch). We have no opportunity of referring to the other positions you mention.

"ἀδελφὸς."—"White Rook."—White has a Pawn at Q B 4th, as mentioned in our last: the solution is 1. B takes B; 2. Q to her B 5th (ch). If Black take the Queen, the Kt mates; and, if 2. K to Q B 2nd, the Q mates at K 5th.

B. P."—Dulwich. Its organ is lost in the mists of antiquity. You still find some pleasing information on the subject in Tomlinson's "Amusements of Chess."

"S. H. W."—We hope the last week's Problem will be a sufficient warning of the folly of sending Diagrams on which the characters are not distinctly marked.

"A. B. C."—You cannot take a Pawn en passing, if a move intervene.

"J. J. A. M."—You will find your Problem corrected, and given as a Diagram in the "Chess-Player's Chronicle."

"H. P. L."—You have not hit upon the author's modus operandi in Enigma 237. He checks first with the Q, and then plays her to K R sq (ch).

"Old Joe" is quite right.

"Puzzled."—We are sorry we have not space to describe the English Chess notation; but you will find the different systems in use both here and on the Continent clearly explained in the "Chess-Player's Handbook."

RE-OPENING OF DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

MADAME DORUS GRAS, AS LUCIA.

This celebrated vocalist is a native of Valenciennes, the daughter of M. Dorus, the leader of the orchestra in that town. Mdlle. Dorus made her début when quite a child; and the Municipality of Valenciennes, remarking her great aptitude for music, placed her at the Paris Conservatoire, at the expense of the Corporation. She became a pupil, in 1831, of MM. Blangini and Henri; and in the first year, won the chief prize for singing in their class. MM. Paer and Berdogni were her subsequent instructors. Mdlle. Dorus soon began her career as a concert singer in various towns in France and Belgium. Her first début on any stage was at the Theatre Royal, in Brussels, where she met with great success; but the Revolution of 1830 interrupted her prospects in Belgium; and, on the 9th of November, 1831, she made her début in Lucia's "Comte Ory," at the Académie Royale de Musique, in Paris. Her triumph was as complete as in Brussels. The secession of Mdme. Cinti Damoreau gave a brilliant position to Mdlle. Dorus, who took the parts of the former in "La Muette," "Guillaume Tell," "Fernand Cortez," and the "Rossignol." Mdlle. Dorus then created the characters of Thersina, in the "Philtre;" the Page, in "Gustave;" and Alice, in "Robert le Diable." In Meyerbeer's chef-d'œuvre, Mdlle. Dorus created the most powerful sensation, and to no small degree contributed to the triumph of that great work. Her love was one of the most exquisite performances ever witnessed upon the lyric stage," to borrow Meyerbeer's own criticism of Mdlle. Dorus's assumption of the maid of Normandy. It should be mentioned, to the glory of the artiste, that every vocalist, including Jenny Lind and Pauline Viardot Garcia, who has played Alice, has adopted Mdlle. Dorus's model; such was her superiority in this part, that it has been justly remarked, "the traditions of her acting and singing have become classical." Subsequently, Mdlle. Dorus created the parts of Marguerite de Valois, in Meyerbeer's incomparable "Huguenots;" Eudoxie, in Halevy's "Juive;" Geneva, in "Guido;" Theresa, in Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini;" Rutia, in "La Xacarilla," &c.

It will be thus seen that Mdlle. Dorus, for fifteen years, sustained the first place in the Académie Royale. In 1833, she was married to M. Gras, one of the first violins of the opera orchestra. Mdme. Gras has a brother who is a famed flute-player. She has been known for some years in London, as a concert-singer of immense popularity, and has frequently sung at the Royal musical soirées. Madame Dorus Gras retired from the Académie Royale during the fatal management of M. Leon Pillet. An interesting anecdote is recorded of her appearance at the Opera Comique, in Herold's "Pré aux Clercs," in consequence of the sudden illness of Madame Casimir. It was a dying request of the composer, whose widow was an affecting letter of thanks to Mdlle. Dorus, for having insured the continued triumph of the work, although she had studied the part of Isabelle at forty-eight hours' notice only. As a vocalist, Mdlle. Dorus Gras, like Mdme. Cinti Damoreau, is the champion of the florid school. She may be called the Persiani of the French lyric stage. Her forte is in fioriture, in which the finish and taste of her execution are most enchanting. Her voice is not now so pure and vibrating as in her best days, but it is still light, nimble, and flexible. Of her vocalisation in Lucia we have written specially in our notice of the opening of Drury-Lane Theatre

MR. REEVES.

The new tenor, J. Sims Reeves, is of a musical family. He has three sisters and a brother at this time in the Royal Academy of Music. His father was a professor of music and singing; and from the paternal instructions did young Reeves, who was born at Woolwich, in 1821, acquire the first rudiments of music. Like the tenor Garcia—the father of Malibran and Pauline Viardot—the elder Reeves was a severe taskmaster, and the child of seven years had hard studies to pursue; but he was already passionately attached to "sweet sounds," and up to the age of twelve remained at home, to continue the discipline. At a grammar-school for two years, Mr. Reeves never neglected, however, his musical studies; and he sang occasionally at concerts, having a beautiful soprano voice. At fourteen, he became a pupil of Mr. H. Calcott, for harmony and counterpoint, and of John Cramer, for the pianoforte; acquiring at the same time some knowledge of the oboe, bassoon, violoncello, and violin, all of which instruments Mr. Reeves played pretty well. His passion for singing was increased by constant visits to the Italian Opera, Rubini being the young student's idol.

By some extraordinary whim, Mr. Reeves turned to the medical profession; but, in a year, gave it up as a "bitter pill and black draught." He indulged at this time in private theatricals. He then took lessons from Hobbs, the tenor, T. Cooke, the late Mr. Stansbury, and others; and, in June, 1839, made his début, as first tenor, at Newcastle-on-Tyne; subsequently playing in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Norwich, Belfast, Edinburgh, Dublin, and many other places progressing but slowly as an actor and singer. Mr. Reeves eventually, after all the trials and vicissitudes of a provincial career, came to London again, and joined Mr. Macready's company. Feeling that he was destined for a higher position, he persevered with his studies under T. Cooke, taking a trip to Paris, also, to have lessons. Mr. Reeves then started on a starring excursion for Liverpool and Manchester, and in those towns met with immense success. Encouraged by this reception, Mr. Reeves resolved to visit and study in Italy, making Milan his head-quarters, and availing himself of the valuable instructions of the celebrated singing-master Mazzucato, the chief Maestro di Canto at the Conservatorio. It was under his able guidance that Mr. Reeves acquired a thorough understanding of the formation of the voice and of the production of tone. Under the Maestro Balfetti Mr. Reeves's schooling may be regarded to have terminated, for finish of execution and refinement of method, and then he made his début at the Scala, having been engaged for two years by Merelli. The part selected was Edgardo, in Donizetti's "Lucia," and created a great furore, although the unpopularity of Merelli as a Director was the cause of great opposition to Mr. Reeves. He afterwards appeared in Verdi's "Ernani," and other operas, with equal success. Mr Reeves then visited Venice, and other towns in Italy, where he was received with enthusiasm. Mr. Beale, the Director of the Royal Italian Opera, Covent-Garden, having written to Mr. Reeves that it was intended to open that establishment in the recess with English opera, induced Mr. Reeves to return to London; but, as the intention was, subsequently, abandoned, Mr. Reeves resolved to go back to Italy, having received numerous offers. M. Jullien prevented his departure, by a most liberal engagement, the moment the lessee of Drury-Lane had resolved to give grand opera. Mr. Reeves sang last season at the Ancient Concerts. Mr. Reeves is a pure tenore robusto. He rarely resorts to the use of the falsetto. Of his triumphant début, last Monday, in the Master of Ravenswood, in the "Bride of Lammermoor," we have written elsewhere.

MR. REEVES, AS EDGARDO.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY-LANE.

M. Jullien commenced his season for grand opera on Monday brilliantly. His orchestra is a great and legitimate success in his first operatic attempt. He has introduced a young sound of real sound fame to the English stage. He has imported from Italy a British tenor who has taken the town by storm—he has brought together a fine chorus and a powerful orchestra—and he presented a stage ensemble of a nature to entitle him to the confidence of the cultivated amateur. Setting aside the over-pretentious tone of the prospectus, and regretting that M. Jullien should provoke, in that document, any invidious comparison, it may be fairly contended after Monday's performance, that M Jullien has made a very fair approximation to the completeness of musical lyric works. It is not, indeed, what is really intended by the words "National Lyrical Opera." Music is a universal language, and it is to be hoped that the great compositions of the Italian, French, and German schools will no more be excluded from our English theatres than the Flemish and Italian schools of painting are banished from our "national" galleries.

In opening with Donizetti's "Lucia," under the title of the "Bride of Lammermoor," it is to be presumed that the lessee had considered this work as the best calculated to develop the powers of his new singers, and the result proved that its calculations were not erroneous. It is an impassioned dramatic work; the inspirations of the composer have kept pace with the terrible situations of Scott's novel. It was certainly not in keeping to have preceded the opera by Beethoven's original "Leonora" overture, the first of the four which he composed for "Fidelio." It is a good idea, certainly, to give an overture by a celebrated master, when one has not been composed expressly for the work; but would it not be better, as in the case of "Norma," to have an overture written for the occasion, embodying the principal themes of the opera? The "Leonora" overture, whilst it displayed the power of the new orchestra, did not altogether satisfy us as to the finish of execution. We do not like the new arrangement of the players by M. Berlioz. He has separated the quartet, and has placed his wind instruments in "long, long row"—in the front rank of the orchestra, keeping his six principal violoncelli and contre-basst in the rear. The consequence is, that the violins—which are really first-rate—seemed to be weak, the tones from the brass and wood penetrating through the house before the subject reached the ear.

With such admirable artists as M. Jullien has engaged, and a better disposition of the strength, much will be gained in delicacy and precision. M. Berlioz, who is a celebrated composer, and who conducts his own works so well, has yet to acquire his operatic experience as chef d'orchestre. In the forte passages, the band achieved some effects—in the nice observance of the crescendo—in the gradual development of the sounds—there will be something to be gained, especially when the full strength of the stringed instruments has been rendered clear and firm.

The opera was thus cast:—Lucy Ashton, Madame Dorus Gras; Edgar, Mr. Reeves; Ashton, Mr. H. Whitworth Jones; Raymond, Mr. Weiss; Bucklaw, Mr. Clifford; Norman, Mr. Galli. Madame Dorus Gras enacted Lucy with grace and feeling. It was not distinguished by dramatic intensity, but it was an interesting delineation, commanding the sympathies of the audience, if it did not startle by powerful emotion. The vocalisation was, of course, superb, although objection might be taken to the superabundance of embroideries, with the compression of which Donizetti, and also Bellini, were responsible. In central, the graces and ornaments of Madame Dorus Gras were brilliant and effective—she strained the high notes with éclat and vigour—and her intonation was rarely to be impeached. Our audience—less exacting than the Parisian dilettanti—did not trouble themselves about the accent of the accomplished vocalist, but applauded her facile and finished execution with the utmost enthusiasm.

On the second representation, on Wednesday night, the ovations were still more decided than even on her triumphant début. Mr Reeves has created the greatest sensation of any tenor since the days of Braham. He is versed in stage business, but it cannot be stated that his person or his deportment commanded his extraordinary success. It was the excellent quality of his pure chest voice—its evenness and sweetness, its tractability, its cultivated style, and perfect articulation, that took the house by surprise, and insured its rapturous expression of delight. Mr. Reeves always rose with the situations. Impassioned in the lovers' exchange of vows, he was terrible in the malediction, and in the scene of despair his pathos was touching and irresistible. On both evenings, Mr. Reeves was received with the most tumultuous cheering, and yet his triumph has been secured under the most disadvantageous circumstances—labouring under a most severe attack of influenza. If M. Jullien had done nothing else than to have introduced Mr Reeves, the lessee would be entitled to a vote of thanks from the musical public. Mr. Whitworth Jones was very favourably received. His opening air was well sung. He has a baritone of fair quality and power, but has an unfortunate lisp. In the concerted pieces, his intonation was not altogether satisfactory, but a cold and stage fright may be pleaded for any defects.

SCENE FROM THE OPERA OF "THE BRIDE OF LAMMERMOOR."

THE GRAND SHAKESPERE NIGHT AT COVENT-GARDEN THEATRE.

THE DEATH OF HENRY IV.—(SECOND PART OF KING HENRY IV.)

LAUNCE AND SPEED.—(TWO GENTLEMEN OF VERONA.)

Weiss sang so finely the music of "Raymond," as to entitle himself to a separate ovation. The other parts were very indifferently sustained; the Bucktail was changed on Wednesday, but with no improvement.

The mise en scène was unexceptionable. Grieve's scenery was much admired; and Planché's historical acquirements were manifested in the correct costumes. The minuet, with its indifferent and interpolated music, ought to be omitted.

After the opera, a new divertissement, arranged by Mr. Barnett, the ingenious ballet master of the theatre, was produced with entire success. It is called "La Genie du Globe," and is a pretty allegorical affair, not aiming at anything extraordinary, but filling up half an hour very agreeably. When the curtain rises, we find the stage filled with clouds, which disperse, and discover the great globe itself revolving on its axis, surrounded by a halo of young ladies in rose-coloured dresses, which has a charming effect. War, Devastation, and other ill spirits, are banished by Peace; and the scene changes to a beautiful landscape, with corn-fields and villages, where all the nations of the earth, in characteristic costumes, are united in concord. Some excellent dancing is then introduced, chiefly of national pas, by Mesdames Louise, Proche Guibelet, Melanie Duval, and Waite, with Mr. Harvey, and four very clever little girls, of some six or seven years old, one of whom is exceedingly pretty and graceful. With a grand tarantelle the divertissement concludes. We object to Miss Waite, from Astley's, being called "Mademoiselle Vaute" in the bills. This is a piece of silliness that approaches the burlesque, and might shake faith in affairs of greater import. The young lady has no occasion to be ashamed of her English name.

We observe that Sir H. R. Bishop, Mr. Planché, and Mr. A. Forrester, are in M. Jullien's Cabinet; so that, with the talents of the artistes in the troupe, much may be anticipated.

Mr. Balfe's opera, "The Maid of Honour," founded on the ballet of "Lady Henriette," is in active preparation, and will be produced on Monday week.

COVENT GARDEN.

As might have been anticipated, this noble theatre was crammed to its very roof on Tuesday evening, on the occasion of the performance for relieving the Committee from their liabilities, incurred in the purchase of the Shakespere House. Every box was crowded, even to the pigeon-holes immediately under the arch of the proscenium; the entire pit, with the exception of six or seven rows, was converted into stalls; part of the orchestra was similarly disposed of; and the amphitheatres and galleries had not a corner vacant. Indeed, they were overfilled; and, in consequence, when Mr. Phelps came on to speak the prologue written for the occasion by Mr. Charles Knight, there was so much noise and confusion that he retired. Mr. Ryder then came on, and, addressing the malcontents, told them that their money should be immediately returned to them if they would leave the house; and, after that, Mr. Phelps again appeared, but the noise continuing, he walked off, after delivering about a third of the prologue. We subjoin the entire composition:—

PROLOGUE.

"The Macedonian stood within the gates
Of the devoted Thebes. Relentless hates
Ask'd to be loos'd in bloodshed and in fire:
Spare not—the conqueror cried: Yet stay, the lyre
Of glorious Pindarus in Thebes was strung—
Search for his house these fated piles among;
Perish the city, down with every tower,
But save, from ruin save the Muse' sacred bower.

"The victor Time has stood on Avon's side
To doom the fa.l of many a home of pride;
Rapine o'er Evesham's gilded fane has strode,
And gorgeous Kenilworth has paved the road:
But time has gently laid his withering hands
On one frail house—the House of Shakespere stands;
Centuries are gone—fallen "the cloud-capped towers;"
But Shakespere's home, his boyhood's home is ours.

"Ye, who this night kind greetings bring to cheer
The histrionic groups assembled here,
Cherish the task, with reverent love to hold
One relic of our drama's age of gold,—
For there, where Avon's long-immortal wave
Lingers in willowy banks by Shakespere's grave,—
The Pilgrims come: Ohio and the Rhine
Send forth their worshippers to Stratford's shrine,—
And still they come, to hail, from every clime,
The Poet of all countries and all time.'

"Perchance, in some dark hour, a venal stage
May leave to bookworms Shakespere's living page
Fit on the brakins to some Newgate gang,
And give the comic mask to drunken slang:
Then, when no bear shall fall for Juliet's woe,
Falstaff be voted dull, and Hamlet slow,—
Then, are new Bettertons and Garricks rise
To win the crowd from scenes the good despise,—
The lowly roof which you are here to claim
From cold neglect or desecration's shame,
May stand, the trophy of a nobler taste—
A beacon-light amidst the drama's waste.

"Yes; when a race unborn shall gather round
His hallowed roof, and consecrated ground,
And secret tears, and smiles of sudden glee,
Attest his sway—the mind's own jubilee;
Remembrance, perhaps, may turn to this 'brief hour,
Which yields our feeble homage to his power:
For here th' assembled Nation stands to say,
Our Shakespere's home is snatched from quick decay;
Is the work finished—or but yet begun?
Complete! Maintain! Do all that needs be done!
Yes! England's heart now beats at Shakespere's call—
The Muse's bower is saved—your's is the pledge for all."

The programme thus went on without further interruption: not a single hitch occurred, nor was one apology made in the course of the evening. The following was the selection:—

The merits of the various ladies and gentlemen who so handsomely gave their services upon this occasion, are too well known to call for any critical notice in this place; nor indeed would such be proper. But the audience, composed, for the most part, of those whose names are in different ways constantly before the public, with a large party of admirers of Shakespere, evidently from the country entered with interest into all the scenes, and were most liberal in their applause. A feeling of curiosity was also mingled with their attention, since, to a large proportion of them, several of the performers were strangers. All, however, as they came upon the stage, in their different scenes, were heartily greeted; the most enthusiastic reception possibly being awarded to Mrs. Glover, to welcome whom a perfect roar of applause burst forth from all parts of the house—her recovery from her recent severe illness being probably one cause of the demonstration. Mr Macready was recalled after the performance; so, also, was Mr. Keeley, Mr. Phelps, and Messrs Harley and Bucknstone. Mr. Webster and Mrs. Nisbett came on hand-in-hand. Mrs. Glover led Miss Helen Faucit across the stage; and Miss Laura Addison possibly the greatest stranger to the audience of the evening—was welcomed in right good style, and, indeed, deserved this, from her excellent acting and graceful deportment.

But to mention the tokens of praise and goodwill awarded to everybody, would occupy too much of our space; else might we tell at full of the rears of laugh-ter called forth by Mr. Farren's Justice Shallow; the cheer of recognition which followed Mr. Charles Mathews' "Sweet Anne Page!" bringing back the by-gone times of Covent Garden Theatre once again; the deep attention and delight with which Miss F. Horton's glorious voice was listened to in the songs of Ariel; the long-lost echo of the old Kemble voice in Mrs. Butler's Queen Katharine; and the effect of Mrs. Warner's statue of Hermione, last, but not least, in the programme of the evening.

The selection, at first view, was open to one or two objections; but the reader should bear in mind that many interests had to be consulted—that all the theatres, with the exception of the Princess', were open that same night; and that the arrangement—detrim-ental as it must have been to all their interests—had to be so made, that none of the current performances were interfered with. About the middle of the evening the following statement was brought to each box

"The following is a Statement of the Sums received, and the Liabilities incurred, by the United Committees of London and Stratford, in aid of the Fund for the Purchase and Preservation of Shakespere's House.

RECEIPTS.
Subscriptions	..	£2900	0 0
This Night's Performances	..	1000	0 0
		£3900	0 0
LIABILITIES.
Paid for Shakespere's House	..	£3000	0 0
Paid for the adjoining Property	..	216	0 0
Advertisements, Printing, Stationery, &c. ..	..	184	0 0
Expenses attending this Night's Performance ..	..	100	0 0
		£3400	0 0

"Five hundred pounds are, therefore, still wanting to relieve the Committees from the liabilities they have incurred in representing what they have considered to be the feeling of the British nation. The duties and expenses of the Committees will not cease, however, with the liquidation of their present liabilities; it is their wish, before they look to the Crown, to place in the hands of the Government of some person honourably connected with dramatic literature, and to remove certain premises adjoining, which injure the appearance, and endanger the safety of the House.

"PETER CUNNINGHAM, TREASURER."

The wish of the Committee to place the house "under the superintendence of some person honourably connected with dramatic literature," cannot be too heartily seconded, if by such a step we are to provide a home for some superannuated dramatist of talent and moral character. Nor do we think that we shall be doing wrong in calling the attention of the Committee to a gentleman long connected with the stage who has brought up a very large and talented family in an honourable manner—who is also connected with a bright name amongst the standard comedy writers of half a century back, and has been ever distinguished by his uniform kindness and right feeling, and unblemished career

The performances were announced to be under the especial patronage of her Majesty the Queen and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, but neither of those august personages were present. Any such step would be a well nigh unprecedented, and looked as dreary, breaking the line of fashion by its void, as the black curtain of Marino Faliero does the series of portraits in the ducal palace at Venice.

ADELPHI.

A very laughable farce, called "A Tipperary Legacy," has been produced at this theatre, the scene of which, however, is in England, although the present state of Ireland appears to have furnished the idea. A retired dyer, Mr. Green (Mr W Iahi), to whom an estate in Tipperary has been left, is seized in have been murdered by his tenants, in consequence of which his nephew aspires to the hand of the intended Mrs. Green. Receiving a threatening letter, however, Mr. Green returns to Kingsland, to the astonishment of his family, and the gigantic actor from the Bath theatre to personate the Irish tenant, and frighten poor Green almost out of his life, driving him into a variety of curious positions, until everything is explained, and the uncle gives up the bride to the prosper ous nephew. The farce is by Mr. Starling Coyne, with whose "How to Settle Accounts with your Laundress," and "Did you ever Send your Wife to Camberwell?" the audiences of the Adelphi are well acquainted. His author pow-ers are as well how to hit their tastes, or to fit Mr. Wright, Mr. Paul Bedford, and Miss Woolgar—who support the chief characters in "The Tipperary Legacy"—with parts best calculated to bring out all their drollest points, and make the piece go with the greatest spirit

CHARING-CROSS HOSPITAL, London, West Strand, near Charing-cross.
TREASURER—VICE Rev. G. H. ROWDEN, 7, Sussex-street; and A. M. Drummond, Esq., Charing-cross.
The Committee earnestly SOLICIT the AID of the Affluent for this HOSPITAL, which has been established for several months at a temporary house in Leicester-square, in consequence of pressing claims of distress in other parts of the kingdom. Although the number of sick applicants has increased beyond all precedent, the Funds are inadequate to the support of more than one-third of the average number of patients.
So important to the surrounding poor is the continuance of its welfare and support, that the Committee venture to make this appeal in its behalf, and they indulge the hope, now that the more remote distress has been befriended, that the great and increasing wants of the Metropolis, and which is best cultivated by public Hospitals, may receive the consideration of an influential community, and be liberally relieved. Such a claim as this Hospital, which solicits at its doors the sick and destitute, may be assisted, to enable the Committee to sustain its useful operations.
Subscriptions are most thankfully received by the Committee, Treasurers, and Secretary, at the Hospital; and by Messrs. Drummond, Charing-cross; Messrs. Coutts, 59, Strand; Messrs. Hoare, 37, Fleet-street; and by the neighbouring Bankers.
By order, JAMES ROBERTSON, Hon. Sec.

TO MOTHERS.—Your medical attendant's advice is, keep your children's feet warm and their heads cool. Your anxiety has hitherto been satisfied in the accomplishment of the most important point—keeping the feet warm. Although Waterproof Socks, Flannel, Chamois Leather have been used for the soles of children's shoes, and wool extended to the ankles, and ADLEY, now offer to your notice the Double Soled, or SOLAR UMBRELLA SOCK, which cannot fail to keep the feet in a comfortable

PRIZE AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS AT THE SMITHFIELD CLUB CATTLE SHOW.

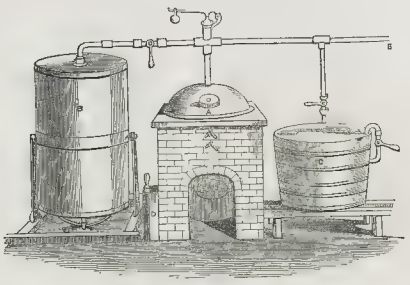
In the Implement Department of the Show, the display of Agricultural Machinery was unusually large; but, of novelties, there were, comparatively, few. The general character of the machinery, however, in point of workmanship and finish, was excellent; and numerous improvements indicate the steady perseverance of the makers in their endeavours to adapt their several implements to every variety of soil and circumstance for which they are intended.

Amongst the principal exhibitors were Messrs. Barrett, Exale, and Andrews, Reading; Bentall, Heybridge; Crosskill, Beverley; Coleman, Colchester; Cambridge, near Devizes; Clyburn, Ulay; Cornes, Bartridge; Cottam and Hallen, Oxford-street; Garrett and Son, Leiston; Grant, Stamford, Hornsby, Grantham; Howard, Bedford; Smith and Co., Stamford; Sanders and Williams, Bedford; Smart, Oxford-street; Smith, Northampton; Smyth, Peasenhall; Wedlake, Hornchurch; Wedlake and Thompson, ditto; and Weir, Oxford-street.

As we before observed, the novelties were few. One of them, exhibited by Messrs. Cottam and Hallen, was Gilbert's Sack Stand, a very simple and useful little apparatus, and calculated to save time as well as labour.

Another, though not an agricultural implement, may, if made on a larger scale, be found a valuable appendage to the stall of the cattle-feeder. This is a small machine, for rubbing, pressing, and straining vegetable and other pulpy substances. It is called Pruday's Crinotriturator, and was exhibited by Welch and Co., of 12, Panton-street, Haymarket. The idea would appear to have been suggested by the great demand for soup during the late severe scarcity; and its chief use, to facilitate and economise the manufacture of that most valuable and nutritious article of food. It is used and strongly recommended by M. Soyer and other eminent artists.

The other Illustrations represent a few of the prize and improved implements of acknowledged value and efficiency, not before introduced to the public in these columns. First is



MEDWORTH'S STEAMING APPARATUS.

MEDWORTH AND CO.'S STEAMING APPARATUS.

This Apparatus is adapted for cooking potatoes, turnips, carrots, mangold-wurzel, and other roots, for steaming hay and chaff, and more particularly for boiling water and the linseed compounds, which have been found to be so beneficial for sheep and bullocks. The Illustration shows the apparatus for fixing in brickwork; it can also be fitted with a range of tubs for the compound to any extent: A is the generator; B, steaming pan for roots, chaff, &c.; C, compound tub; D, supply cistern and pump; E, pipe for continuation of tubs. The Linseed Compound Tub has a graduated scale affixed that the weight of water may at once be seen; a jet of steam is introduced, which stirs it up much more effectually than can be done by hand, and thus makes it an employment for one man or lad instead of two; again, by merely turning the steam-cock off or on, the boiling will be carried on more or less rapidly at pleasure; and, by turning quite off, will be much more effectual, cleanly, and convenient, than raking out the fire, which can be used at the same time for other purposes. The Steam Generator has no more mystery in it than boiling a common tea-kettle; nevertheless a card, in large print, framed to hang up, with precautions so as to keep the water a certain height (that is, between the gauge cocks), is sent out with each. The Tub or Generator can be had separately, and fitted to any apparatus already in use, or a common copper fitted to the same principle.

COLEMAN'S PATENT SUBSOIL HARROW.

This implement, commonly called a "Grubber," is, perhaps, one of the most useful mechanical agents employed by the farmer. The engraving represents one exceedingly simple in its arrangement; the process of lifting or depressing the "slade" to any required depth is effected by means of the bent lever above, which is a continuation of the back prong, and is connected with the fore prong by a crotch bar above and the "slade" below; the prongs turn on centres between the beam, which is composed of two parallel bars; and when the lever is pulled back, the slade is fixed by a nut at the back of the cross-bar. By these contrivances, it is enabled to perform all the operations of a broad share, skim, or surface plough; it is most effective as a scarifier or drag, and may also be converted into a subsoil pulveriser.

BUSBY'S NORTHAMPTON PRIZE PLOUGH.

This Plough obtained the Ten-pound Prize, at the Royal Agricultural Society's Meeting at Northampton, in July last. It is for strong land, and at the trial was found capable of working 12 inches deep; it has two wheels in front, and, with a lighter breast, or mould-board, may be used as a two-horse plough.

CORNES' IMPROVED CHAFF-CUTTING MACHINE.

The Engraving represents the Chaff Cutter, which obtained the Royal Agricultural Society's Prize of Ten Pounds, at their Meetings held successively at Shrewsbury, in 1845; Newcastle, 1846; and Northampton, 1847; besides minor prizes from the local Agricultural Societies of Liverpool and Chester. The Machine is adapted either for manual or steam power; it carries three knives, and makes five different lengths of chaff, viz., two for horses, two for cattle, and one length of four inches for litter; it is also fitted with an additional pair of feeding rollers, which are registered, and which prevents the necessity of employing men or boys to feed the machine, thereby avoiding the risk of injury by the entanglement of the feeders' hands in the hay or straw.

HEDGE'S IMPROVED THRASHING MACHINE AND HORSE-WORK.

This is a compact little machine or three horses, and is represented as packed for travelling: its peculiarity consists in raised to any requisite height, always preserving its parallelism to the horizontal beam, whilst it is secured in its position by a pin passed through holes in the segments between which it moves.

BENTALL'S PATENT BROADSHARE AND SUBSOIL PLOUGH COMBINED.

This is a somewhat novel combination of the broad-share with the subsoil plough; the lines, which carry the broad shares on either side of the body, are attached to the cross-bar at the heel of the beam, and can be adjusted to any width within its limit, and also raised or lowered to the extent of the ratchet teeth shown on the line, and the drum—inside of which the beaters revolve, being constructed of iron gratings, the bars of which are placed diagonally to the beaters, instead of being parallel, as is generally the case. It is a new implement, and was exhibited on Wednesday for the first time.

GILBERT'S SACK HOLDER

PRUDAY'S CRINOTRITURATOR.

The uses of this machine have been already described above, —The pulp to be strained is placed in the vessel at the top, the lower part of which is of a semicircular form, as shown by the dotted line, and is made of gauze wire; on this a stiff brush (also shown in dotted lines) is made to rotate backwards and forwards by the handle above, the point of insertion of the handle being the fulcrum on which it turns. The pulp is thus rubbed through the meshes, and collected in a suitable vessel, placed underneath.

GILBERT'S SACK HOLDER.

No description of this instrument is necessary, beyond stating that it may be placed at any angle to suit the height of the person filling the sack; and that its position is secured by a ratchet catch fixed to the longitudinal bars on either side, the other ends of which drop over a pin projecting from the triangular stay, and which terminates in a pointed crotch on the floor, to prevent it from slipping.

INVASION.

THE question of national defence, and the extent to which England ought to be prepared to meet a foreign invasion, is one of those uneasy topics that, always undecided, reappear every now and then with the effect of producing a certain amount of alarm and discomfort. "A mote it is to trouble the mind's eye." The landing of a French army on the sea coast is an event not very probable; but, as there have been invasions in times past, there is at least a possibility of it—quite enough to throw timid people into a state of mild terror, as they peruse some leading article proving how easily we could be subdued, and painting England lying "at the proud foot of a conqueror." The last great shock the public received on this subject was a rumour of a letter written by the Duke of Wellington, and addressed to a General Officer. But as nothing authentic can be learned as to the opinion of his Grace on our ability to resist an invader, the sensation has abated. Certain it is that Julius Cæsar landed not far from where Walmer Castle stands, not without some difficulty. And the Danes and Saxons landed everywhere, at many times, for some centuries; and last of all came the Normans, the results of whose invasion were durable and important enough. But from that time the tide has turned; we have always been the invaders not only of France, but of a good portion of the world. Paris has been several times in our possession; our Kings were crowned there; they held the land in fief; and for ages we had a remnant of territorial power there after the bulk of it had been wrested from us. Calais was a kind of Gallic Gibraltar, vexing the souls of Frenchmen till exasperation reached the fighting point, and we lost it. In later times, Dunkirk played a similar part; but Charles the Second, like the clever and unprincipled King he was, sold to France for a good round sum, what France would probably have taken by force. But, through all the troubles and dissensions of our worst days, when Charles the First, married to a French Princess, was at war with his people, and foreign aid might have saved his throne, it is singular that France never made any effectual attempt to land forces in England; we had then but a small navy; and the powerful Royalist party would have aided such an invasion. Spain, when the greatest power of the world, was just as unsuccessful in her attempts at invasion. The fate of the Armada is well known; and, in after ages, the combination of the two Crowns against us was just as ineffectual. Certainly, it seems to us the species of terror that is expressed by some journals about the probability of invasion, is unfounded. If we examine the relative strength of nations now, we shall find that France and Spain are less powerful compared with what England is now, than they were two centuries ago. Spain has sunk to nothing; and, from being almost mistress of the world, has neither navy nor commerce. Take the state of France in the reign of Louis the Fourteenth; her army was then the largest in the world; her generals were the greatest Europe had ever seen; their names are still among the highest in military annals. Her navy was far superior to that of England; and, to crown all, the King who swayed all this machinery of power was cursed, like Napoleon, with insatiable ambition and lust of conquest. Had England then trembled, and cowered, and talked of building a circle of forts round her coasts, there might have been a reason for it. But consider what time has done for our progress, and where she has placed us in the rank of nations. From being a third-rate Power, England has risen to be the first; while Spain and Portugal have declined, and France remained stationary, or even retrograded, we have increased in all the elements of power, numbers, empire, wealth. Napoleon did not add to the real strength of France: in the revolution that preceded him, she was stripped of all her colonies. His wars, gigantic as were his successes, concluded with this result, that he left France with a smaller territory, less wealth, less population, and her fleet utterly destroyed. Algeria has not compensated for the losses of that era. France is still great; but, compared with England, neither greater nor more formidable than she was in the middle of the last century. We should not fear to say that she is less so. Facts, too, are daily proving that the peril of invasion has been much exaggerated. It is said that steam and railways have rendered our old bulwark, the ocean, useless to us. It is not the case: England is still like the jewel—> set in a silver sea,

> That serves it in the office of a wall
> Against the envy of less happy lands.

Steam and railways give our possible enemies no special advantage over us. We have both, and in greater proportions; our miles of railway are fourfold those of France; our steam-power even greater. It is said, there is only one ship of seven hundred tons in the whole commercial marine of France; and, from recent events, it does not seem that the peace has converted our neighbours into good seamen. France is a military nation; with her army we do not believe that, single-handed, we could compete; we cannot recruit from thirty-five millions of people, and no emergency would ever reconcile the English to the conscription. There is, therefore, across the Channel, an immense military force, great in military skill, and abundant ardour, stimulated, doubtless, by much national hatred. But that force can only become formidable by landing here; while confined to its own territory, an army of half a million of men can no more injure us than if they were in the Moon. The point is to make the ocean impassable; the Channel is our line of defence, and we firmly believe that, at the present moment, the French are less able to attempt to force it than ever, while we are better able to resist the most strenuous attempt that could be made. Allow a foreign army to land and we grant all the rest; but, it is the shipment and the landing that would be the impossibility. Why now, in profound peace, with all the assistance the State can give, the attempt to establish a line of steamers between Havre and New York is a complete failure. Four steam-frigates, built in the Royal dock-yards, have been given to the Company, but they have not made one average voyage; they have been constantly beaten by sailing vessels, have suffered all sorts of disasters, the last of which is the worst; the Union, after being out eight days, was forced to put back to Havre, nearly water-logged. In short, says a correspondent of a morning paper, "badly built, ill found, and worse managed, these French frigates have exhibited, in a lamentable manner, the worthless materials of which their steam navy is composed; and have most satisfactorily proved that the overwhelming superiority which we possessed before the use of steam has been in no degree impaired by its introduction, but exists in full force under the new system."

The same inference may be drawn from the frequent wrecks of French ships of war, within the last year; it has excited remark in the French press itself. We are better able to invade France than the French are to invade us; but there is this difference—we could not land any disciplined force that would not be overwhelmed by numbers; the attempt would be mere madness. On the other hand, a French army would find nothing but a mob to prevent its march to London; but then that army cannot be brought over. So luckily there is an impossibility on both sides, and circumstances govern both countries to wiser purpose than they seem able to do for themselves. To show how mutual the terror is, we may state that only on Monday last a deputation from Havre, consisting of the Mayor and the Presidents of the Civil Tribunal and the Tribunal of Commerce, arrived in Paris, to solicit that a bill may be presented respecting the fortifications on the coast, and the protection of the port against invasion! And the Havre people are right; for that port, and Toulon, and other French towns have been bombarded and injured more than once by British ships, within the present century, while our coast has never heard the sound of a French cannon. Which side of the Channel has most cause for apprehension?

HEALTH OF TOWNS ASSOCIATION.

On Saturday last a public meeting of the members and friends of this Association was held, at the Hanover-square Rooms, in furtherance of the cause of sanatory reform. The meeting was well attended, and was somewhat remarkable for the number of ladies present. On the platform were, Earl Fortescue; Lord Ash-

Cameron; and numerous other members of the Health of Towns, and other Associations for the Promotion of Sanatory Improvement.

The Marquis of Normanby took the chair.

Deputations were also attended from Liverpool, Bradford, Derby, Nottingham, Sheffield, Halifax, Wolverhampton Preston, Stafford, Plymouth, East Retford, Manchester, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and other large towns.

Apologies for non-attendance were received from Lord John Russell, M.P., the Duke of Buccleuch, the Earl of Shelburne, Viscount Morpeth, M.P., the Bishop of Norwich, &c. &c.

The noble Chairman, in opening the proceedings, referred to a report issued by the authori ies of Sheffield, from which it appeared that in the West Riding alone the annual loss in "preventible" disease was no less than £1,500,000; and, the population being 1,000,000, the loss was as at the rate of from seven to eight-and-twenty shillings per head. He would only add a few statistical facts, which he did not hesitate to consider as deserving the very serious consideration of friends of sanatory reform. The first was the vast difference in the health and mortality of towns as compared with the rural population. In the rural districts the deaths were as 1 in 58; in towns, as 1 in 28; the average in the two being 1 in 40. In Rutlandshire, to take a particular county, the average of human life was twice the duration of that at Manchester; and, from the latter place, registments were twice recruited for once from the rural districts. (Hear, hear.) In the parish of St. Saviour, Southwark, the average duration amongst the gentry was 47, tradesmen 25, artisans 22; and, amongst the lowest only 15. There was, indeed, an enormous disproportion in the average of human life in the same district, the amount of which disproportion at least must be set down to causes which it was within their power to prevent (cheers), and, he was happy to say, there was a plentiful show of energy now. The supply of water, which was as necessary to health as their breathed, was declined to be as free and unrestricted. (Hear, hear) After some further observations, his Lordship sat down amidst loud applause.

Lord Ashley, who was received with general cheering, moved the first resolution. He said it was exceedingly gratifying to him to see so large and respectable an assemblage, both on the platform and in the room, because it showed how the interest in this mighty question was increasing, and afforded well-grounded hope of support for her Majesty's Government in the excellent course they had determined to pursue. (Cheers) He would show his gratitude to the meeting for the kind reception it had given him, by taking up the shortest possible speech, not detaining his hearers for one moment longer than was absolutely necessary —and for this reason, that there were many speakers to be heard on the question, new absorbers in the vineyard, men of rank and in substance, who were giving the weight of their names, their talents, and their influence to this great and indispensable movement. (Hear, hear.) The resolution which had been placed in his hand would tell its own story. It was to the following effect:

"That the vast amount of disease always prevailing, greatly augmented during the past and present years, and likely to be still further increased by the visitation of the cholera—and proved by excessive Government Commissions, as well as by recent local investigations, to exist in every part of the empire, in connexion with causes admitting of removal —renders it imperative that sanatory legislation should be immediate, and as universal as the evils it seeks to remedy."

Dr. Guy seconded the resolution. He believed that in the present age no case could be argued effectually without the use of figures, and, therefore, he would lay before them a few facts and figures illustrative of the state of the public health, merely premising that he based his calculations on an average the most moderate possible. He would take an average of human life below that of the registrar-general, and he would tell them the result of his observations. The system of registration had been in force about nine years, and in the healthiest year the number of deaths in England and Wales above what is called the standard a fair and moderate standard, say two in a hundred of the population, was 25,000 For the return of the United Kingdom, allowing the same ratio, the number of deaths above a natural standard would be 42,000. (Hear, hear.) Take part, an average of seven years, 1841 being the middle year, and testing the morality by the same modera e standard, an excess of 30,000 deaths would be found for England and Wales, and 31,000 for the United Kingdom. Now, if had been estimated that for every unnecessary death there were 23 cases of unnecessary sickness. Exception might be taken to that estimate as exaggerated, but take 20 cases of unnecessary sickness for each unnecessary death, and that would give in the healthiest year an amount of no less than half a million, and on an average of seven years, an amount considerably exceeding one million cases of unnecessary sickness annually. (Hear, hear.) In the case of the metropolis, the annual waste of human life was 10,000, and the cases of unnecessary sickness 250,000. In his opinion these facts fully justified the first clause of the resolution. (Hear, hear.) With respect to the second, insisting on the imperative necessity of sanatory legislation, he would merely take the figures of the registrar-general. It appeared that during 116 distress of England and Wales, there occurred in the year ending September, 1843, 181 000 deaths; in 1844, 167,000; in 1845, 171,000; in 1846, 178,000; and in 1847, 210,000; being a difference between 1843 and 1847 of no less than 30 000 deaths above the average. They were beginning to hope that this fearful mortality was abating, the number of deaths for the last quarter being somewhat less than that of the corresponding quarter in 1846, but scarcely had they commenced their congratulations when the influenza made its appearance, and in the week before last took away 700 persons above the average. (Hear.) Last week it had increased to 1460, being no less than double the usual mortality. He would merely add one fact from the recent Report of the Sanatory Commission, which ought to be in everybody's hands. From 1845, through 1846, down to the present year, what he would call our pet pestilence, typhus, had been increasing year by year, week by week, and day by day. This, if figures won d prove anything, was final as to the justice of the concluding portion of the resolution. One more remark upon the subject of cholera. He was extremely anxious not to create unnecessary alarm on the subject, but it was right to state that some cases had been actually reported in the metropolis. (Hear, hear.) He was willing to put the most favourable construction on this report, to assume the probability that the physicians might be mistaken, but what then? The whole past history of the present epidemic led to the conclusion tha it was the precursor of cholera. How were we prepared to meet it? In fact, we were wholly unprepared to meet this frightful enemy. (Hear, hear.) The report of the Commission to which he had alluded pointed, however, to one consolatory fact, namely, that the disease was not contagious, so that no one need fear to attend his friend or relation. (Hear, hear.) But it also proved that the cholera track was the fever track and the filth track; that it was to be found in the same spots, clinging to the same houses, and carrying off the same class of persons. (Hear.) This was simply borne out by evidence from all parts of the country. In corroboration of this he would state, that at the preliminary meeting held on the previous day there were present two gentlemen, one from Sheffield and another from Norwich, who stated, in almost the same words, that in both towns cholera haunted the spots previously minted by fever. (Hear, hear.) He must also add, that during the past week the spots in the metropolis which were most unhealthy, had exhibited the greatest mortality. Thus, the west London district exhibited a mortality of 98 out of 46,000, while in the east there died 73 out of the same number. Hackney, a comparatively healthy district, stood as St George's-in-the-East had stood 82 He would merely, in conclusion, make one observation with regard to fever. He had said that it was our pet pestilence, and certainly, if we loved it, we could not have better means to keep it among us than to hunt and to extend it, than we had done. We had been told that wherever there was filth there would be found fever, and yet we had taken no more pains to remove vice and filth, than if it were an inevitable blessing. (Hear, hear.) Towards the century since the prisons of this country were visited by the benevolent Howard, and he protested against their condition in the same terms that they (the Health of Towns Association) had used in describing the present state of the houses of England. He pointed out the injustice of adding to the necessary punishment of crime the physical punishment of disease. The condition of the prisons was reformed, and what was the consequence? In describing the prisons of a century later, clergy had to be asked for for the free labourers of this country. Was not this a mockery? (Loud cries of "Hear, hear.") He said it was a shame to the Legislature that while the prisons of a century since were done up decently, sooner was now withheld from the industrious labourer and artisan. (Hear, hear.) Was it not saying to the labouring m n, "the only way in which you can get air and light and clean water, is to commit crime and then get into prison." (Hear, hear.) But better times he trusted were approaching. Benevolent men were applying sound commercial principles to the question, and would assuredly find that the re ra ly the country ...ly more economical would be its support (Hear.) He had one thing more to say; every one who had attacked an existing abuse with vigour, had been charged with exaggeration. They had been charged with exaggeration, but he was greatly offended at the charge. This was not a matter so much for the intellect as for the feelings, and where the feelings were concerned, exaggeration was at all times a more excusable error than indifference. (Hear, hear.) It is people were sensible of nothing to believe them; to believe that they were placed in bad circumstances for the security of their own lives. Let any man read the popular literature of the day, and he would see the authors burning over and over again the same topic. He was to be found in the fashionable novels of Disraeli, and in the everywhere popular works of Charles Dickens, and, what was better still, some were assisting the cause not only with their pens, but their purses. Some writers might, in their descriptions, exhaust the full fervence of the artist. Not so Charles Dickens, who, not satisfied with writing on sanatory matters, had helped the cause by contributing out of the hard-won earnings of his pen, the liberal sum of £10 to the Association. (Loud cheers) Dr. Guy concluded by seconding the resolution, which was put and carried unanimously.

Mr Bouverie, M.P., proposed the second resolution, viz. :—"That this meeting regards with lively satisfaction the earnest recommendation contained in the Speech from the throne—the expressed determination of her Majesty's advisers to renew the efforts made by Lord Lincoln and Lord Morpeth to forma sessions of Parliament, and the practical step taken by the Lord Chancellor in remodelling the Metropoli n Sewers' Commissions."

Mr. Cardwell, M.P., seconded the resolution, and observed that, by giving to the poor in large towns the means of practising cleanliness which they could not in their present small and over-crowded dwellings—they would extend to them the means of cultivating domestic attachments, virtue, and religion.

Mr. Shafto Adair, M.P., proposed the third resolution, as follows :—

"That all past experience, and the nature of the case, enforce the necessity of combining in any sanatory measure an efficient local administration, responsible to the rate-payers, with the superintendence of a Government department, duly represented in Parliament."

Mr. Heywood, M.P., in seconding it, observed that in Manchester, there was a local Health of Towns Association, which had worked well; but, he must also add, that great advantage had been derived from the information collected by the Government Commission. Amongst the other names on that Commission, he must prominently mention Dr. Southwood Smith and Mr. Chadwick (loud cheers)—than whom there never were more able professors of the science of sanatory improvement. (Hear.) Carried.

Lord Ebrington, M.P., moved, and Mr. Baines, M.P., seconded the fourth resolution, viz.:

"That, although great exertions have been made by sanatory associations, ably seconded by the press, to arouse the public mind to a sense of the evils—physical, economical, and moral—which affect all classes, but especially the poorest, much ignorance and apathy still remain. And that this meeting, while it pledged itself to aid the Health of Towns Association in the efforts now making for their removal, would especially call upon the clergy and members of the medical profession to exert their powerful influence in furtherance of this great object."

On the motion of Mr. Slaney, M.P., seconded by Dr. Southwood Smith—"That the thanks of this meeting be cordially tendered to the Most Noble the Marquis of Normanby, for his able and impartial conduct in the chair, and his valuable services to the cause on all occasions."

The noble Marquis acknowledged the compliment, and the meeting separated.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

Reform dinners were becoming daily occurrences in France, "to the great dismay of the Government," we are told. Rumour was busy on the subject, and averred that a warm altercation had taken place in the Council between MM. Guizot and Duchatel—the former reproaching the latter with mismanagement, proved by the progress of Radicalism; and the latter retorting on foreign—especially Swiss—affairs.

The Moniteur publishes Royal ordinances appointing M de Bacourt, the present Minister of France in the United States, Ambassador to the Court of the King of Sardinia and Minister Plenipotentiary to that of the Archduchess of Parma, in the room of Count Mortier; the Duke de Glucksberg, Minister Plenipotentiary at Madrid, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of the Queen of Portugal, in the room of Baron Werigraf de Saint Hermes, who is transferred in the same capacity to Denmark; M Pagest, Minister Plenipotentiary, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary in the United States of America; and the Duke de Bassano, Secretary of Embassy in Brussels, Minister Plenipotentiary in the Duchy of Hesse.

PORTUGAL.

The elections throughout the country having terminated in favour of Costa Cabral's party, his accession to power may now be looked for within the next six weeks, as the election of deputies was to take place on the 12th inst., and the Cortes to assemble on the 2nd of January. The following are said to be the dramatis personæ of his intended Administration: President of the Council, Duke of Saldanha; Home Department, Costa Cabral himself; Justice, Silva Cabral; War, Duke of Terceira; Finance, Count Tojal; Marine, Falcao; Foreign Affairs, Marquis of Fronteira.

PRUSSIA.

The Prussian Government strenuously continues its efforts to centralise and settle the affairs of the Protestant Church, and to give it uniformity and unity. A supreme Consistory is to take place at Berlin, composed of all the provincial Consistories. M. de Gossler, who is well known by his strict religious orthodoxy, has been nominated President of this supreme authority of the ecclesiastics. Administration of Prussia.

AUSTRIA.

The Austrian Governor of Cracow has published the following decree ..." His Majesty the Emperor has thought right to ordain, by resolution of 21st Nov., 1847, that those persons who, after the 1st of January, are guilty of high treason in the following specified cases: 1st, Those who shall excite others to revolt or insurrection, with high treason in view, although without success. 2nd, Those who shall resist with an object and that successfully, the armed force. 3rd, Those who being armed shall join a crowd, and not obey the authorities who may order them to withdraw, or who, during a revolt, are seized with arms in their hands

The French continue their embargo at Buenos Ayres against external approach, but the domestic traffic between that place and Monte Video remains unmolested, and small craft, well laden, are constantly passing from one city to the othe ..

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The Book Racing Calendar for 1847—or rather, the volume of the work which treats of races past—was published the latter end of last week. In the present instance, however, it is not confined, as heretofore, merely to the returns of sport for the season, but furnishes its readers with a list of all the foals of the year,—that is, of course, of all the thorough-bred foals,—a goodly company, amounting, in the whole, to 877, namely, 452 colts and 425 fillies. On many accounts this is a very interesting document. In the first place, as furnishing a light of characteristic comment on the nature and principle of the rural resources of England She stands unrivalled in the breed of her horses, and for these she is indebted to a spirit which induces many of her proudest nobles to plant estates for the existence of the turf, we gather from the annual publication of which we are now speaking. From the data given in this list, who are the great producers of the costly and valuable commodity? The noblemen and gentlemen who patronise the first of our national sports . . . the Fitzwilliams, Exeters, Richmonds, Spencers, Chesterfields, Johnstones, Herberts, Heathcotes, Montyns, and others of their class, who adopt the course as a recreation. It may be said, that Mr. Tattersall, and Mr Kirby, and Mr. Allen, and Sir Tatton Sykes are large breeders, though they are not on the turf -but no one will question the facts that has given them a run for its cost. Sport, and not profit, was and is the mainspring which set and keeps the turf going—and the turf produced and perpetuates our noble race of coursers.

In the second place, this list incontestably proves that, of those connected with racing, it is least indebted for support to the parties who live by it, and right well too. You examine the catalogue, from the first item to the last, and, though you detect here and there the name of a member of the Ring, for one betting man as a producer of racing stock you find a score of country gentlemen, with their little Olympic broods—men that never won a sovereign on a race in their lives—and never stand to win, but they can quit a "pull through" a plate or a cup on a scent—who, looking to the returns of the "Calendar," were the great winners of the season?—and who are likely to be the great winners of future seasons, should the system of sacrificing sport to speculation be persisted in? Not the breeders of the best animals—the best trained; but the owners of the worst animals—best managed.

The bandicap will assuredly give as heavy a blow to the true interests of the turf, as did the fraternity of legs, in their especial generation We say did; for the spirit of both days is fast dying out. The bandicap will be seen to have saw the commencement of their decline and fall; the end cannot be far off. Presently the promoters of handicaps will be taught that they are wrong—upon principle. The object of the turf is sport, and to bring people a favourable agent and opportunity; and when its legitimate patrons see their liberality abused, they will not be slow to testify their opinions; and so, as in all else, the bane will bring the antidote. Seeing that become a public nuisance—in that capacity it exists no more. It is now a private grievance—in that relation it will not be tolerated very much longer.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY

The Bishop of EXETER presented the petition, complaining of religious destitution in the town of Devonport, of which he had given notice.

The Crime and Outrage (Ireland) bill was brought up from the Commons and read a first time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

Mr. PATTISON asked if it was true, as reported, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that the proposal that the Government should share with the Bank of England in the profits of the eight per cent. discount, lately fixed as the minimum, had come from the Directors ?—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER observed that the Governor and Deputy-Governor of the Bank and the Government had frequently met, and they agreed to the condition attached to the rate of interest fixed.

Lord J. RUSSELL gave notice that, on Monday next, he would move, provided the Irish Crime and Outrage Bill had then obtained the Royal assent, that the House should at its rising adjourn to Thursday, the 3rd of February.

To a question from Mr. SANDARS, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER stated that it was not the intention of the Government to propose a further suspension of the RAVIGATION or the Corn Laws

In reply to Mr. T. BARING, Lord PALMERSTON said that the French and English Governments were in perfect accord upon the question of the blockade of the River Plate; and that he thought there was a fair prospect of seeing hostilities there put an end to.

To a question from Mr. J. O'CONNELL, Lord PALMERSTON replied that the Government had received, officially, the decree of the newly-established Government of Fribourg, which expelled the Jesuits and their affiliated orders, but that he had not received similar decrees from the Government of Lucerne. He did not see, in the present state of things, any thing to call for the interference of the five Powers.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND) BILL.

On the motion for the third reading of this bill, Mr. J O'CONNELL moved, as an amendment, that the bill be read this day six months that day six months.

Mr SMITH O'BRIEN seconded the amendment.

Mr ROBINSON and Mr. M. J. O'CONNELL made a few remarks.

Mr. MAHON charged the Irish Members with being themselve the cause of all the misgovernment of Ireland, by want of combination and agreement between themselves in Parliament; he lectured Irish proprietors for their inhumanity, and the Irish people for their idleness; and he impressed on the Government the necessity of bringing in bills for the sale of encumbered estates, for the simplification of titles to estates, and for the diminution of the expenses of transferring the property in fee; and he strongly urged the advisability of abolishi g entails and primogeniture.

After observations from Sir B. HALL, the House divided—

For the third reading	.. .. ..	173
Against it	.. .. ..	14
Majority	.. .. ..	—159

The bill was read a third time, and, having received some amendments, passed.

On the motion for the reception of the report of the Railways Bill,

Mr. AUGUSTUS STAFFORD called attention to the condition of the railway labourers, and announced his intention of submitting a series of resolutions on this subject after the recess

Sir G. GREY would be ready to consider any resolution that might be proposed for the objects mentioned; but he trusted more to the voluntary efforts of railway companies and contractors than to legislative enactments. He instanced the benevolent efforts of Mr. Peto to provide for the comfort and instruction of his navvies.

Lord G. BENTINCK did not think the devil so black as he was painted, nor the railway companies and contractors as neglectful as had been stated. Mr. Peto, the gentleman mentioned by the honourable baronet, had provided a regular staff of religious instructors; indeed, his establishment was a pattern for all others to follow. It could hardly be said that railway companies were quite neglectful of their duties, or did not contribute their fair proportion to relieve the destitution of the country, because it appeared that they paid £400,000 to the poor-rates on 50,000 acres—one fifteenth of the whole rates

After a conversation in which some others received; the new clauses, of which Mr. STAFFE had given notice, having been added to the bill.

The PUBLIC WORKS (IRELAND) BILL.—This bill passed through Committee.

NEW ZEALAND.—Mr. LABOUCHERE moved for leave to bring in a bill to suspend the operation of some of the most important provisions of the Act of 1846, for the Government of New Zealand. After a discussion, in which Mr. Gladstone, Mr. V. Smith, Mr. R. Palmer, Mr. C. Buller, Mr. Aglionby, &c., took part, Mr. LABOUCHERE replied, and announced his intention to fix the second reading for Monday next, in order that it might go out to the colony that the principle of the bill was affirmed. He would name the time for the consideration of the details.

—Leave was given to bring in the bill.

COMMERCIAL DISTRESS.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, on rising to nominate the Committee on Commercial Distress, said, as he could not, with the usual number of fifteen, name all those gentlemen who would serve with advantage in this enquiry, he proposed that the Committee be enlarged, and consist of twenty-six members.

Mr. HUME objected to the Committee being appointed in a mere blind, and moved, as an amendment, that the nomination be adjourned.

Colonel SIBTHORP seconded the amendment

Mr. HERRIES felt inclined to think, with Mr. Hume, that the inquiry would not lead to much good.

The House divided—

For the adjournment	.. .. ..	57
Against it	.. .. ..	.. 146
Majority against adjournment		.. —89

Lord G BENTINCK emphatically denounced the proposed Committee as one that would be unsatisfactory to the country. The noble Lord moved, as an amendment, that the Committee be enlarged to the number of thirty.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER opposed the amendment. He believed that a Committee of twenty-six would be numerous enough.

Lord J. MANNERS supported the nomination of eight members of the present and late Governments as the more practical plan. Some result might be looked for from them

The House divided:

For Lord G. Bentinck's amendment	.. ..	.. 45
Against it	.. ..	.. 136
Majority against the amendment		.. —91

Mr. W. FORBES moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. WAKLEY supported the motion. A Committee so constituted would be a perfect mockery.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER was willing to postpone the nomination of the Committee to Tuesday evening. All he desired the House then to affirm was, that the number of the Committee should be twenty-six.

After a lengthened conversation, the motion that the Committee shall consist of twenty-six members was carried, and the nomination was postponed to Wednesday.

The House adjourned at a quarter to two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Duke of RICHMOND inquired when the medals would be distributed to the officers, soldiers and sailors who had served in the general actions in the Peninsular war, and if it were intended to extend the grant of medals to other officers, soldiers, marines, and sailors who served in the late war?—Earl GREY said the medals were in the hands of the Duke of Wellington, and by an accident which befel the artist. The claims were being decided as rapidly as possible, but there were very many yet to be considered. It was found that commanders of the navy had not been entitled to the medals granted to commanders of regiments, and some extension to the navy would therefore be made.

AFFAIRS OF ITALY.—Lord STANLEY put the question respecting the protracted absence of Lord Minto, of which he had given notice. The absence for several months of the Lord Privy Seal, particularly at a time when it was found necessary to call Parliament together, entitled Parliament to ask for an explanation of this absence. He (Lord Stanley) opposed the policy of the interference of the Government to establish diplomatic relations with the Court of Rome, and that Lord Minto's absence was connected therewith, but as it had been stated by Lord Palmerston that the Lord Privy Seal was not the representative of the British Government. What the object of the movement going on in Italy was, and what was understood by the cry of the "Independence of Italy," he (Lord Stanley) could not well say; but he thought the last course the Government should pursue would be to give such encouragement to the political agitation of Italy as the sending of a Cabinet Minister of the rank of the Lord Privy Seal would indicate. It appeared from the newspapers that the Pope had suspended to the call of the crowds in the streets of Rome, had appeared at the balcony of his hotel, and had joined in the cheer for the independence of Italy. What provision, he desired to know, had been made for the discharge of the duties of the absent Lord Privy Seal; also, what was Lord Minto's mission, whether he was accredited to any of the Italian Princes, and whether the Government desired to interfere by means of moral influence with the affairs of Italy?—The Marquis of LANSDOWNE said the office of the Lord Privy Seal was not one that required constant personal attendance; but a commission had been issued to provide for the discharge of the duties during Lord Minto's absence, who was undoubtedly employed on a most important mission. The movement that was progressing in Italy, so far as it went to the establishment of necessary internal reforms, could not be condemned, and was desirable that the friendly advice of England, and a proper encouragement to the Italian Governments, should be given, so far as the reforms were confined to internal improvements in each individual state. Therefore, Lord Minto had been selected to aid the Italian Sovereigns, with the exception of the Court of Rome. The instructions given to him were to confine his advice to such reforms as touched the internal affairs of the several States, for the Government were anxious to preserve all cordiality between the Italian States. Though not accredited to the Court of Rome, the noble Lar. had there derived most valuable information. In conclusion, the Marquis of Lansdowne declared h s own opinion to be that it was unnecessa ies that we had not diplomatic relations with the Court of Rome

SWITZERLAND.—To questions put by Lord Beaumont, the Marquis of LANSDOWNE stated that, as there were no longer two contending parties in Switzerland, the contemplated mediation of the Five Powers was at an end. But Sir S. Canning was instructed, on passing through Switzerland, to place himself in communication with the authorities, and offer any advice in his power, but in no other way to interfere in the domestic affairs of Switzerland.

The Railways Bill was brought up and read a first time, and their Lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

A new writ was ordered to be issued for Sunderland, in the room of Mr. D Barclay, who has accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

Lord G Bentinck presented petitions from the planters of Trinidad, Dominica, and other West India Islands, complaining of great distress, and of breach of faith on the part of the Imperial Parliament; and praying that the admission of slave grown sugar into Great Britain might be discontinued.

To a question put by Mr. C. Anstey, Sir W. Somerville stated that there was not any ecclesiastical patronage attached to the office of Lord Chancellor of Ireland.

In reply to Major Blackall, Sir W. Somerville said that it was not the intention of the Government to resume the system of Public Works in Ireland.

The Attorney-General, in answer to Mr. Urquhart, stated that the Government had defended the actions in the cases of Escott v. Denman, but he refused to say what were the grounds of their defence were.

The Railways Bill was read a third time and passed.

PRIVILEGE.

Mr. Wakley brought under consideration the petition of electors of the West Division of Gloucester, complaining of the interference of Earl Fitzhardinge in the late election, and moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the charges made against the noble Lord.

The Attorney-General opposed the motion, on the ground that, if the charges were well-founded, the ordinary Courts of Law were the proper tribunals. Even were the charges substantiated, the House would have no power to deal with Lord Fitzhardinge.

Captain Berkeley read a statement written by the Earl Fitzhardinge, denying the charges as trumped-up falsehoods.

Mr. Charley Berkeley said he was prepared to prove that several of the troop of yeomanry had left in consequence of the coercion of the noble Earl, their lieutenant.

Lord J. Russell did not think that, on the presentation of a petition, the House was bound by its standing orders to institute an inquiry. If the matter of the petition could not be investigated by an election committee, there might be some reason for a motion such as that made, although on that point he would like to reserve his opinion. The proper tribunal, however, would be a Court of Law.

Sir G. Grey moved the adjournment of the debate, in order to give time to consider if there were peculiar circumstances in this case of which the Law Courts could not take cognisance.

Sir R. Peel coincided in this course, and the debate was consequently adjourned to Friday.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION.

Mr Hogsman called attention to the Act 6th and 7th Wm. IV., c. 77, providing for the enlargement of the incomes of the smaller bishoprics out of the surplus of the larger and wealthier sees. The hon. member moved an inquiry to the effect—That from the reports furnished by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners themselves, it appears to this House that the provisions of the Act 6th and 7th Wm. IV., c. 77, so far as relates to episcopal incomes, has not been carried out according to the intention of Parliament.

Mr. Plumptre seconded the resolutions, and expressed his belief that the working of the Ecclesiastical Commission had been most unsatisfactory.

Sir G. Grey did not think the adoption of the resolutions would answer the object of the mover and seconder. To the two first resolutions he would, if pressed, move the previous question. The third resolution he would meet with a direct negative.

Lord J. Russell admitted that it was obviously inconvenient that Bishops should continue to receive incomes above what was intended. But there were great difficulties in framing the Act of Parliament, and it had been carried into effect so far as Commissioners could do it. He did not see his way sufficiently clear to warrant him in making any alteration of the present system.

Mr. Heywood suggested an amendment of the principal resolution, so that it would, in effect, declare that the provisions of the Act required the immediate consideration of the House.

Mr. Horsman professed his willingness to adopt this amendment.

Mr. Gladstone objected even to the modified resolution.

The two first resolutions were then put, and the amendment of the previous question was carried.

On the third resolution, as modified, the House divided—

For the resolution	.. .. ..	65
Against it	.. .. ..	130
Majority against the resolution	.. ..	—65

The three resolutions were then negatived.

Mr. Packe obtained leave to bring in a bill to alter the time for holding the Epiphany Quarter Sessions

Adjourned at eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—WEDNESDAY.

The Crime and Outrage (Ireland) Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed.

The Public Works (Ireland) Bill was read a first time.

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

Major Blackall gave notice that, on Friday, he would move that the House should not adjourn without taking into consideration the distress of Ireland.

The Public Works (Ireland) Bill was read a third time and passed.

COMMERCIAL DISTRESS.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, on rising to propose his own name as the first on the list of twenty-one members to form the Committee on Commercial Distress, observed that a statement to prove that the names had been selected with the view to strict impartiality and the fair representation of every interest, as well as of the Currency, and for and against the Bank Act. There were Members of the late and present and future Governments, and he did not think the last could complain, for there were Lord G. Bentinck, Mr. Hope, and Mr. Masterman, whose interests and opinions were decidedly opposed to the beloved the Committee, as he proposed it, would be esteemed as fairly constituted.

Mr. Drummond addressed some remarks to the House on the general question of the Committee.

Mr. B. Osborne considered the Committee a mere pretext for shirking the question. He had himself voted for the Committee on a former day, and was by his vote on that speech made by Sir R. Peel; but, when he calmly reasoned on the subject in the morning, he sincerely regretted that he had not voted for Lord George Bentinck's amendment. The Committee, as proposed, would give no satisfaction; if one was to be appointed, it would be much better to nominate twenty-six members who had expressed no opinion on the Bank Act, or who had read no book on political economy or currency.

Mr. Ewart believed that the names proposed by Lord G. Bentinck, being those of men practically acquainted with the operation of the existing system, would, if anything could, give the public confidence in the proposed inquiry; but, if the Committee were constituted as proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, no one would regard it but as a blind to get rid of the question.

Lord George Bentinck said that in proposing to add Mr. Labouchere and other gentlemen from the Committee, nothing could be further from his thoughts than to cast on them the slightest reflection, or to use towards them the least discourtesy. The Committee was limited to 26, and he had no alternative but to exclude some in order to propose others. The fundamental vice of the Committee, as proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was, that it contained eight members of the late or present Government, who were banded together as one man, and who would vote through thick and thin with their leaders, while those who were opposed to the Bank Charter Act were independent men, bound together by no party—no official tie. These eight gentlemen would, therefore, entirely secure the inquiry. But, taking another view, there were Peelites and eleven strong Whigs on the list proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, without including Mr. Hume; thus there would be seventeen Members of the Committee all of one way of thinking, and who would completely silence the remaining nine. The noble Lord proceeded to establish that the country bankers, Liverpool, London, Scotland, Ireland, and the Bank, were not manufactur minority to dispute the competence of the Assembly, the central authority would be paralyzed, and the Confederation impracticable."

The Federal Council of War has published a report of the killed and wounded during the late war, from which it appears that the total numbers were, as stated, and 385 wounded, on the Government side. The loss on the side of the insurgents has not been ascertained, but it is supposed to be three or four times greater.

Sir Stratford Canning arrived on the morning of the 7th at Neufchatel, and immediately had an interview with M. de Sydow, the envoy of Prussia to the Confederation, and with General Pfuel, the Governor of the principality. Sir S. Canning left the same evening for Berne, where he arrived on the night of the 8th, and held a conference with Mr Peel on the morning of the 9th: he had afterwards an interview with M. Ochsenbein, which continued to late hour. The note of Prussia had been delivered to M. Ochsenbein that morning by one of the secretaries of the Prussian Legation. It was identical with those of France and Austria. The cantons of the defunct League were proceeding with the elections of their respective grand councils as well as cantonal authorities. The popular assemblies of these cantons respectively had passed resolutions in substance similar to those of Freiburg and Lucerne, renouncing the League, acknowledging the authority of the Diet, and re-organising their governments.

The General Assembly of the people of the Canton of the Valais adopted on the 5th, resolutions similar to those adopted by the other Cantons of the Sonderbund, renouncing the League, &c.

The Provisional Government of Lucerne has effected a loan of 180,000 francs in Austria, 100,000 at Baie, and 30,000 at the convent of St Urban.

From the state of the chest of the Canton of Lucerne, recovered from the fugitive authorities of the Sonderbund, it appears that the treasury of the League derived its chief resources from loans supplied by Austria, and from an examination of the arms and artillery captured or surrendered, it appears that the League derived its arms from France—the cypher of Louis Philippe was found upon the artillery.

THE CIVIC GUARD-HOUSE AT ROME.

Our Illustration presents a panoramic view of Zurich, the most important manufacturing town of Switzerland, the capital of the Canton of that name, which has taken the leading part in the recent struggle.

The town lies at the north end of the lake of Zurich, and on the banks of the Limmat. It is the seat of the Swiss Diet, alternately with Berne and Lucerne for a period of two years together.

The banks of the lake and river, and all the neighbouring hills, are thickly dotted with houses, now united with the town itself by the removal of the useless and inconvenient ramparts, and forming a wide circle of suburbs.

There is little worthy of note in the public buildings of Zurich. Its most pleasing features are its promenades, the best of which commands a delightful view of the town, lake, and distant Alps.

Zurich is historically remarkable as the place where the Reformation first commenced in Switzerland, in 1519. It has also been the asylum of many eminent English Protestants; and here was printed, in 1535, the first entire English version of the Bible, by Miles Coverdale.

ITALY.

Letters from Naples of the 4th have been received, which afford information of a definite kind respecting the popular movements reported to have taken place at Palermo on the last days of November.

In the evening of the 29th ult. the populace still crowded the streets, and one of the leaders, who had a tricolour flag, placed himself at the head of an immense group in the street of Toledo. This assemblage proceeded to the square of the Dome, where their leader got upon the pedestal of the statue of Saint Rosalie, the patroness of Palermo, and shouted "Long live the King!" "Long live Italy!" "Long live the Constitution!" He then harangued the crowd on the political condition of Italy, and made it promise to confide in the councils of the intelligent classes. "The object which you propose," said he, "is also their object, and it can only be secured by unanimity. When justice and moderation shall have been tried in vain, if it be necessary to have recourse to arms, you will do so with dignity and resolution." The people declared with enthusiasm that they would follow this wise counsel. Whilst this was going on in the square, the élite of the population were deliberating at the Casino, on the means of pacifically utilising the popular enthusiasm. Some instants afterwards the crowd stepped in front of the Casino, to learn the decision of its members, the principal of whom had been sent for by General Viale, Commandant of the Garrison, and Chief of the Police, who invited them to call on the King's Lieutenant. This personage declared to these notables that he was ready to grant the institution of a civic guard, and recommended them to call on the following day, with the Municipal Council, to receive the authorisation. This decision satisfied the people, who withdrew in the greatest order. But, in answer to the instructions demanded from Naples by the telegraph, the King's Lieutenant was positively ordered not to authorise the formation of a civic guard, and ordered to repress, with the greatest energy, every popular demonstration. On the 30th these instructions were communicated to the popular committee and the municipality, who withdrew in consternation, and would no longer show themselves to the people. Placards were posted up, prohibiting, under the severest penalties, all public meetings and cries of every description; but these placards were immediately pulled down. During this time a group was passing by the office of the Commissariat, and, without any provocation on its part, was fired upon by the soldiers on guard. One person was killed, and four were dangerously wounded. The population of Palermo no longer seeing its Chiefs, cries of "treason" were raised, and the agitation increasing, the Chiefs at length resolved to show themselves. After great efforts to restore confidence, the Chiefs succeeded in calming the people, by promising constantly to aid them with the same ardour in their struggle for reform.

Letters from Rome, of the 5th, report the death of M. Silvani, a distinguished lawyer of Bologna. The success of the Swiss Diet in its war against the Sonderbund produced a great sensation in all parts of Italy. On the evening of the 3rd, on the arrival of the news of the surrender of Lucerne, there was a great popular demonstration at Rome. The populace, preceded by bands of music, and holding innumerable torches, proceeded to the hotel of the Swiss Consul, whom they saluted with the usual patriotic exclamations. The principal streets of the city, through which the procession passed, were illuminated. The flags of the several Swiss Cantons, the tricolour Italian flag, and that of the Pope, were displayed in great numbers on the occasion. The acclamations referring to the capture of Lucerne were especially vociferated in front of the College of the Jesuits. A declaration of the Government, disapproving of these proceedings, appeared in the Diario of the 4th.

Lord Minto gave a grand dinner on the 1st, at which Cardinal Antonelli, President of the Council of State; M. Minghetti, Deputy of Bologna; the Marquis Pasolini, Deputy of Ravenna; the Marquis Azeglio, and many others, were present.

The Diario of Rome publishes the following as the reply of the Pope to the address of Prince Corsini, in the name of the municipality:—

"The words which you have just addressed to me, my Lord Senator, are a source of consolation to me; for they give me the assurance of the good sentiments which animate the municipal magistracy, whose duty it is to watch over the interests of a city so remarkable for its souvenirs, by the cultivation of the fine arts, and by so many other qualities, and which is to me the object of so much love. I have already said many times, and I repeat it, in order that it may be remembered, that I instituted the communal representation for the welfare of the Roman population. Your administration will, I doubt not, produce happy results for industry and commerce; but especially through you will flourish what is the greatest of all possessions—true religion. I pray God every day for the public prosperity. To-day, I will pray him specially that he will deign to guide your labours, and that he will maintain among you union and concord, which are the most solid bases of society. May God especially maintain concord and make peace to shine over all Italy! Nothing is so necessary as peace to cause industry, commerce, the arts, and public felicity to flourish."

The arrangement effected between Tuscany and Modena, so far as it will affect Fivizzano, has been announced in two proclamations which have appeared in the journals of Sardinia and Tuscany, one issued by the Grand Duke of Tuscany, and the other by the Duke of Modena.

The office of Secretary of Memorials, left vacant by the nomination of Cardinal Altieri as President of Rome and the Comarca, has been conferred on Cardinal Ferretti, Secretary of State.

The Illustration shows the noble quarters, or Barracks of the Civic Guard, in the Piazza di Campitelli, at Rome. It is, as the entrance denotes, a large palatial edifice, bearing the Papal arms over the doorway. The institution of the Civic Guard, it will be remembered, has been one of the most popular acts of Pope Pius.

THE COMMERCIAL TRAVELLERS' SCHOOLS AT WANSTEAD.

THE COMMERCIAL TRAVELLERS' SCHOOLS.

One of the beneficial results of the anniversary celebrations of the Public Charities of the Metropolis is the opportunity they present of rendering the public more familiar with the excellent aim and object of such Institutions. It affords us much pleasure to announce a commemoration of this kind which will take place on Monday week, the 27th instant, at the London Tavern, in aid of the Commercial Travellers' Schools.

This benevolent Association originated at the meeting of a few commercial travellers, in July, 1845, who, feeling that an asylum for the maintenance, education, and clothing of the children of deceased and necessitous members of their class was needed, at once set about the good work of establishing the same. Within six months they raised among their fellow-travellers upwards of £3000 in aid of the projected schools; and such was the effect of this zeal of the travellers upon their principals, and commercial firms generally, that, by aid of their liberality, the funds, in July, 1846, amounted to £6000; and the only expenses which the Society had incurred, were those of rent, printing, and stationery—their secretaries, managers, canvassers, and collectors being all honorary and zealous officers.

In December, 1846, the rules of the Institution were finally settled and agreed to at a meeting of the whole body of subscribers.

A building suitable to the purposes of the charity was next taken upon advantageous terms; the Trustees having the right of purchase of the same. The building is situated upon the borders of Epping Forest: it is calculated, with a very trifling outlay, to accommodate 150 children and a suitable establishment. The grounds are spacious, ornamental, and useful

In June, 1847, twenty children (fifteen boys and five girls) were elected into the Institution. The next election will take place on the 28th of December, when twenty children will be elected from a list of twenty-eight candidates.

The Society has (besides defraying every expense of the Asylum and Office to the present time, and paying for the large quantity of furniture, &c. &c., required for the Institution) purchased stock to the amount of £6000, in addition to a considerable sum remaining in the hands of the Treasurer.

A building fund will be set on foot in the ensuing year, when it is believed that the wholesale firms of London and the large towns will respond liberally to the call of the commercial body in aid of this benevolent cause.

The system of Instruction and general treatment pursued in this Institution secure the religious moral training of the children; and they are instructed in all the branches of a commercial education.

The Schools are based upon Church of England principles; but they are open to the children of every religious denomination who in other respects are eligible.

The too common practice of dressing the inmates of institutions similar to this in a marked and distinctive dress is carefully avoided. neat and appropriate clothing is provided in each case, such as children of the same station in life may be presumed ordinarily to wear.

The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor will take the chair at the public dinner on the 27th. About 160 Governors have accepted the office of stewards: the season of hospitalities is favourable to "all mankind's concern—charity;" and a great meeting is anticipated.

A SHIP ON FIRE.

On the afternoon of Thursday, the 9th inst., at five o'clock, a large vessel was seen on fire in the west bay, off Weymouth. She is described as burning "with awful fury." The wind was blowing very strong from the W.S.W.; the greatest anxiety was felt respecting the fate of the vessel, or rather that of those on board of her; there was a heavy sea running in the bay, but several vessels went to her assistance. Towards evening, she rounded Portland, and a boat from the island went out and passed round her. Her stern was destroyed, so that her name could not be ascertained, nor where she came from. She was a fine brig, about 600 tons burthen, and laden with cotton. She continued drifting with the tide, and her hulk is stated to have gone on shore near St. Alban's Head. We are happy to add that her captain and crew were all safely landed at or near Bridport.

At Southampton, on the same day, the Tagus, Captain Evans, arrived, and reported as follows:—

"Dec. 9.—Wind S.W., strong breeze. Bill of Portland, S.W. 10 miles. At 3 A.M. perceived a fire in shore of us. Steered for it, suspecting it to be a ship on fire, which, on approaching, proved to be the case; got the boat ready to take crew out should they not have already left the vessel. On nearing, she proved to be a ship apparently about 400 tons, wall-sided, scroll figure-head, masts and decks burnt out of her, but the bowsprit was yet standing. We passed close a-head of her, and perfectly satisfied ourselves that the crew had already left. She had, no doubt, from the progress the fire had made, been on fire several hours. We recommitted well around us, and could not perceive any signs of boats, masts, tops, or spars floating alongside. We, therefore, proceeded at full speed."

We have the following additional intelligence from Cowes:—"Late on the 10th, the Jan Hensell, Mr. Davidson master, fifty-seven days from Odessa, arrived here with loss of sails, boats, &c., having encountered the recent fearful storm. At two o'clock A.M. on the 8th, when 25 miles S.W. of Portland, they saw a-head a vessel apparently on fire, smoke issuing in great quantities from her ports. Bearing down, they found her to be the American ship Robert, George Shaw master, and that she was abandoned. Her boats were gone, and her cargo, which was evidently cotton, was on fire. On examination, every effort seemed to have been taken to check the fire before the crew deserted her. Every hatchway had been secured by a sort of cement, so as to prevent the flames spreading. When fallen in with she had her mainstop-sail backed, and foretop-sail hove to, her head to the northward and westward. She was evidently bound for Havre, as samples of cotton were found on the cabin round-house on deck, addressed to merchants at that place."

According to a letter dated Treguier, the 9th inst., in a Brest journal, the American merchant vessel, Robert Shaw, was struck with lightning on the night of the 6th inst., off the island of Batz: the cargo, consisting of cotton, immediately ignited. The captain and crew, in all sixteen persons, not being able to extinguish the fire, abandoned the ship, and succeeded in gaining Treguier in their boat. The Robert Shaw was on her passage from Charleston to Havre. This is inferred to be the vessel which was seen by the Tagus, and the Ann Hensell; and which our Artist has depicted.

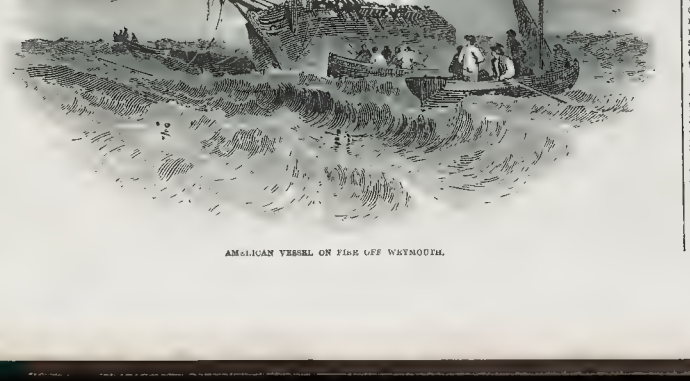
On the 9th, a fishing-boat of Roulogne fell in with an English dismasted schooner abandoned by her crew, near Dover, and six of the crew of the boat went on board to attempt to carry her to the Downs. They had not been many minutes on board, when the schooner went down, and all the six fishermen were drowned. One of them was father of five children.

SLAVES CAPTURED.—By intelligence from St. Helena, we learn that the slave vessel Sappho, captured by the Conient, 12, Commander M'Murdo, in charge of Lieut. Tuvey; the slaver Stiletto, captured by the Penelope steam-frigate, flagship, in charge of Lieut. Haswell, of that vessel; and the slave ship Venus, captured by the Styx steam sloop, Commander Chads, in charge of the Stockholm, arrived at that island, the first on the 23rd October, and the latter on the following day, for adjudication.

STARTLING FACTS.—The Lincoln Mercury says:—"The practice of taking opium, laudanum, ether, and morphia, has increased and is increasing amongst the population of the fens of Cambridgeshire and Lincolnshire to a frightful extent. It obtains amongst the aged, the infirm, and the young, and it is confined to neither sex—old men, old women, and young females, are equally its victims. It is common to see the man or woman of 20, 30, or 40 years, with cadaverous countenance, tottering frame, and palsied step, daily going for his or her sixpennyworth of poison; and we have heard of yearly bills of £20 in one family for opium and laudanum! In the town of Wisbech alone, there are 400 gallons of laudanum sold and swallowed every year; eight gallons of laudanum per week, one small shop actually vending two gallons of this quantity! Added to this, there are 1,126,780 gallons of beer, and 20,500 gallons of ardent spirits, consumed annually in Wisbech; while there are 170 persons engaged in retailing tobacco."

THE following statistics of the Roman Catholic Church in Great Britain, have been published in the Catholic Directory for 1846:—The total number of Roman Catholic churches and chapels in England and Wales, is 545; in Scotland 85, besides 92 stations where divine service is performed; making a grand total of 630 churches and chapels. Of Catholic Colleges there are in England 10, and in Scotland 1. Convents 38, of which 21 are in the London district. Monasteries, 4. Of missionary priests in England and Wales there are 707, including priests without any fixed mission; in Scotland, 99; making a total of 806 missionary priests in Great Britain, including the bishops.

MDLLE. DELUZY.—Mdlle. Delmay-Desportes has just presented a demand against Marshal Sebastiani, for the delivery of the legacy of 2000 francs in Rentes, which the Duke de Praslin made her, as governess of his daughters, by his will of 1843. She further demands that different objects which were given to her by her pupils, and which are at present under seal, shall be restored to her; as also the restitution of a sum of money which, she says, she confided to M. de Praslin to invest.



AMERICAN VESSEL ON FIRE OFF WEYMOUTH.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.—No. III.

MR. JOHN REYNOLDS, M.P.

Mr. Reynolds was elected for the City of Dublin by a sort of chance-medley: in a moment of confusion, while all parties were fighting, the division placed him above the conflicting parties, who were only recalled to a sense of their want of policy, by finding Mr. Reynolds, to whom nobody ascribed a chance of success, duly elected. We have frequent occasion to complain of a want of truth and candour in the party organs of Ireland; and the tone in which Mr. Reynolds was spoken of by them, during the Election and after it, was most unfair. It had, however, this advantage—the new member proved far better than his newspaper reputation. And, in fact, compared with the mediocrity of most of the Repeal members, and the leaders especially, Mr. Reynolds occupies a prominent position. He speaks well, clearly, and with readiness; has no assumption of leadership; and, above all, though decided in his opinions, is open to the influence of reason and common sense in dealing with measures. He was a wholesale draper in Dublin; an active manager of the National Bank, of which Mr. O'Connell was Chairman; and he took the chief part in the business of a Land Association. He made his début in the Currency debate, wisely choosing a subject with which he is practically acquainted. Though disapproving of the Coercion Bill, he waived opposition to it when he found opposition useless; but he is a severe exposer of the oppression of "landlordism."

MR. JOHN REYNOLDS, M.P. FOR DUBLIN.

The hon. member is brother of the better known "Tom Reynolds," one of the humbler agitators of the great days of Repeal, and who now holds some Corporation office in Dublin. The hon. gentleman has sometimes been confounded with his relative.

INDIAN LOCK.

This curious Lock is in the form of a bird; probably, representing the Hindoo god, Garuda, the carrier or bearer of Vishnu, the second of the Hindoo Triad, Garuda being to Vishnu what the eagle is to Jupiter. Garuda is worshipped by the natives of Madras; and, his living type, a kind of large hawk, is diligently fed by the devotees: the writer has often seen the worshippers with little baskets, filled with flesh, which is thrown skilfully, a small piece at a time, into the air, while they shout, "Hari! Hari!" a name of Vishnu, and the bird stoops on the wing and takes the prey. Garuda is supposed to possess human, or, rather, divine, intelligence, and is much revered. Many stories are told of his discernment and cunning; and it is, probably, on this account that the native artist has made his Lock in the form of Garuda, a sufficient guarantee, in his notion, for its acting as a safety or detector, equal, or even superior, to the more mechanical and scientific inventions of Bramah or Chubb. We should add, that, in this Indian Lock, the key-hole is on the side, one of the wings of the bird serving as a shifting escutcheon.

INDIAN LOCK.

Mr. J. O'Connell.—His father had unbounded iteration, so has the son; only what he iterates is never striking, even at the first time of utterance. His father used to read documents, and so does he; only they don't apply. He bores the House to the verge of endurance; he pours forth maiseries the most trivial and vapid in substance, the most emphatic and ferocious in manner. The House would be amused if it were not wearied. His own deliberate tediousness extorts yawns, and laughter, and audible disgust; and so he accuses the House of attempting to crush what he calls Irish discussion.—Spectator

The Secretaries to the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge received, this week, £170 in Bank of England notes; and the Society for Providing Additional Curates in Populous Places, £50, both from unknown donors.

The Secretary of the Samaritan Society attached to the London Hospital received, on Tuesday, £100 from John Oliver, Esq., in aid of the funds of the charity.

Destitution in Zetland.—The present condition of a large number of the Zetland Islands is that of extreme want, and the Edinburgh Committee have despatched a commissioner to enquire and investigate into the state of matters there. It is feared that if speedy relief is not sent them, matters must inevitably become most distressing.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1847.

A CASE brought before the House of Lords on Tuesday evening by Lord Brougham, illustrates a defect in the administration of justice in Ireland, which has done more to exasperate the people of that country than perhaps even more direct oppression. The instances are too frequent in England of the facility with which "interest" and "connections," as they are called, can push by the law, and escape its sentence. But in Ireland it is done in a cool systematic mode of procedure, as if it was the acknowledged right of the rich and noble to be exempted from the operation of the law they may have flagrantly violated. While such things are done, or permitted to be done by the Government, it is useless to expect any regard to the law in the people. Nothing will convince them there is not one law for the rich and another for the poor.

Some time ago, a gentleman, a Barrister, wealthy, or related to a wealthy family, for he could pay for every device the law furnishes for defence, was convicted in Dublin of bigamy, with circumstances of aggravation; he was also party to an indictment against the first wife for the same offence, and she was induced to plead guilty to the charge, though there was not the least foundation for it, by what influence is easier to imagine than state distinctly; she was of low birth, and poor.

The whole case, from beginning to end, exhibited a cold heartlessness seldom found even in the sad records of our Criminal Courts. All legal resources having been exhausted, the accused was sentenced to seven years' transportation. Is he undergoing that sentence, as any ordinary man in England or Ireland would be, in a convict gang, or the hulks? No: he has been pardoned by the Government, on "condition" that, for "a certain period of time," he absents himself from her Majesty's dominions! He has given securities that he will do so, to the amount of £5000; and that form having been complied with, he may be at this moment enjoying himself in Italy, or the South of France, or wherever he pleases. The plea on which the pardon was granted, was his "bad state of health!" That was good reason for lodging him in the Prison Infirmary, certainly, and giving him fit medical attendance; but weakness or disease does not cancel crime, and brings with it no exemption from the penalties of the law.

But, it may be said, the prisoner's life was in danger—that, if he remained in prison, he would have died. Be it so: human justice does not turn aside for the consequences it may entail on those who offend it. If a surgeon's certificate gave a claim to a pardon in every case, what confidence could be felt in the execution of the law? Ordinary criminals sicken and die in prison and hulk by the hundred, and no Secretary of State troubles himself about the matter. If all are equal in the eye of the law, why are these exceptions so constantly made for the wealthy or well-born? The feeling created by it saps the very foundations of social order. But in Ireland, there does not even seem to be an idea on the part of the Executive that there is anything wrong in it. The Marquis of Clanricarde, in stating the negotiation of the Government with the felon, spoke as if it was quite a matter-of-course proceeding. Yet, in the next debate on Ireland, he will probably be heard regretting the little respect the people have for the law! If there is a different law for all classes, how can they have any? If any mitigating circumstances had been discovered after sentence—if the least doubt had been felt of the man's guilt—an interference by authority would have been just and praiseworthy. We would not have the law vindictive; but severe impartiality is its very essence. It ought to know no distinctions but those of guilt and innocence. It should not persecute any; but, if its penalties are incurred, they should be suffered by all. It should be like the poet's description of the Simoon of the East,

Which seeketh not, so that it is not sought;
But being met is deadly.

ELECTION TO THE BENCH OF THE MIDDLE TEMPLE.—The following new regulation has been adopted by the Society of the Inner Temple:—"Resolved unanimously, that no person shall be elected to the bench of this Society, unless he obtain the votes of the majority of the existing benchers; and that four black balls shall be sufficient to exclude."—Hilary Term, 1847.

DEATH OF DR. WIGAN.—This gentleman expired last week, at his residence Queen-street, Camden town, after a very short illness. Dr. Wigan was well known as a writer for the periodical press, and as the author of a work "On the Duality of the Mind." The deceased attributed his fatal illness to having stood over an open drain in the neighbourhood of Regent street, when he felt sudden ly ill, and was obliged to go into an hotel, where he nearly fainted. From that moment his naturally robust constitution appeared to receive a shock from which he never rallied.

THE WEATHER.

THE weather during this week has been remarkable for the continued high temperature of the air; the average for the season being about 35° and 40°, has been exceeded every day, and, at the beginning of the week, this excess was very large. During the first part of this week there was a remarkable period of high uniform temperature, and, at the latter part, the weather has been fine. The direction of the wind for the week has been S.W.

The following are some particulars of each day.

Friday, the sky was overcast throughout the day; a fine thin rain was falling during the morning; the direction of the wind was S.S.W.; the day was close and warm, its average temperature was 52°, being nearly 14° above that for the season; the night following was also warm, and the temperature did not descend below 50°. Saturday, the sky was cloudy till 3h P.M., and it was cloudless after this time; the direction of the wind was S.S.W.; the temperature of the air during the morning was at about 50°, and after 1h P.M. it began to decline, and at midnight it was at 38°; the average for the day was 45°. The period of time between Thursday, December 9, at 8h P.M., and Saturday, December 11, at 3h P.M., was remarkable for almost an uniform temperature, the extreme difference between these times being 4°only; the extreme temperatures have been 50° and 54°; so that during these two days the usual decimal change of temperature did not take place. Sunday, with the exception of a short period of time before and after noon, the sky was mostly free from cloud during the day; the direction of the wind was S.W., and the average temperature for the day was 45°. Monday was a fine day, the sky was for the most part covered with thin clouds, except between the hours of 1 and 3 in the afternoon, when it was cloudless; the direction of the wind was S., but light; and the average temperature for the day was 46°. Tuesday was a fine day, the sky was overcast till 11h A.M., and mostly free from cloud after this time; the direction of the wind was S.S.W.; the average temperature for the day was 45°. Wednesday was a fine day; the sky was cloudless till 1h P.M.; between 1h P.M. and 2h P.M. the sky was partially clear, and after 3h P.M. the sky was overcast; after 10h P.M. a thin rain began to fall; the direction of the wind was S.S.W.; the temperature of the air at 1h P.M. was 55°, at 3h P.M. it was 49°, and at 5h P.M. it was 50°, and it continued very nearly 50° till midnight; the average temperature for the day was 44°: the temperature did not decline below 49° during the following night. The average temperature for these six days was 47° nearly.

The extreme thermometrical readings for each day were:—

Friday,	Dec. 10, the highest during the day was 54	deg., and the lowest was 33	deg.
Saturday,	Dec. 11	52	 38
Sunday,	Dec. 12	51½	 40
Monday,	Dec. 13	50	..... 44½
Tuesday,	Dec. 14	51½	..... 44½
Wednesday,	Dec. 15	51½	..... 40½

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT OSBORNE.

Her Majesty, the Prince Consort, and the junior members of the Royal Family continue to take open air exercise daily.

On Saturday morning, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, attended by Lady Fanny Howard and Sir George Couper, left Osborne at eleven o'clock, crossed in the Fairy, steam packet, to Gosport, and took her departure by the London and South-western Railway, on her return to her residence, Frogmore House, Windsor. The Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay and Sir James Clark arrived in the afternoon, on a visit to the Queen

On Monday, the Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby arrived at Osborne from town, on a visit to her Majesty. Sir James Clark left Osborne.

On Monday evening the Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby had the honour of joining the Royal circle at dinner

On Tuesday, the Viscountess Canning arrived, and has succeeded the Marchioness of Douro as the Lady in Waiting to the Queen.

On Tuesday afternoon, the Queen, accompanied by the Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby, and attended by the Hon. Mrs Kerr, took an airing in a carria e and four. Professor Sedgwick arrived at Osborne, on a visit to her Majesty. The Royal dinner party included the Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby and Professor Sedgwick.

On Wednesday morning, the Royal Children went to the beach and walked, and rode on their ponies. The Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby left Osborne on that morning, embarked at Osborne Pier in the Undine, commanded by Commander Allen, and crossed to Gosport, on their return to town.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge went on Tuesday morning, to the East India House. His Royal Highness afterwards paid a visit to Haylebury College.

HER Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge, accompanied by his Serene Highness Prince Frederick of Hesse, returned to her residence at Kew, on Tuesday, from huouring the Marquis of Salisbury with a visit, at his seat, Hatfield House, Herts.

LETTERS from Rome mention that the Earl and Countess of Minto and the Ladies Elizabeth and Charlotte Elliot are to prolong their sojourn in that city a and it is said, that the last post conveyed instructions for the breaking up of the noble Earl's establishment in London. The Earl and Countess are received with great distinction in the highest circles, and the presence of his Lordship at Rome seems to have afforded satisfaction to all parties.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

DR. HAMPDEN.—PROTEST OF BISHOPS.

The following members of the episcopal bench have addressed to Lord John Russell, on the appointment of Dr. Hampden to the see of Hereford, a communication, in which they state it to be their duty to represent to your Lordship, as head of her Majesty's Government, the apprehension and alarm which have been excited in the minds of the clergy by the rumoured nomination to the see of Hereford of Dr. Hampden, the soundness of whose doctrine the University of Oxford has affirmed, by a solemn decree, its want of confidence." This virtual protest is signed by G. J. London, C. Winton, J. Lincoln, Chr. Bangor, Hugh Carlisle, C. Rochester, Nich. Bath and Wells, J. H. Gloucester and Bristol, H. Exeter, E. Sarum, A. T. Chichester, J. Ely, Saml. Oxon.

Lord John Russell in reply says

"I observe that your Lordships do not state any want of confidence on your part in the soundness of Dr. Hampden's doctrine. Your Lordships refer me to a decree of the University of Oxford passed eleven years ago, and founded upon lectures delivered fifteen years ago. Without at that decree, Dr. Hampden has acted as Regius Professor of Divinity. The University of Oxford, and many Bishops, as I am told, have required certificates of attendance on his lectures before they proceeded to ordain candidates who had received their education at Oxford. He has likewise preached sermons, for which he has been honoured with the approbation of several prelates of our Church. Several months before I named Dr. Hampden to the Queen for the see of Hereford, I signified my intention to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and did not receive from him any disconragement. In these circumstances, it appears to me that, should I withdraw my recommendation of Dr. Hampden, which has been sanctioned by the Queen, I should virtually assent to the doctrine, that a decree of the University of Oxford is a perpetual ban of exclusion against a clergyman of eminent learning and irreproachable life, and that, in fact, the appointment is now by law vested in the Crown, is to be transferred to a majority of the members of one of our Universities. Nor should it be forgotten that many of the most prominent among the majority have since declared their communion of the Church of Rome. I deeply regret the feeling that is said to be common among the clergy on this subject. But I cannot sacrifice the reputation of Dr. Hampden, the rights of the Crown, and what I believe to be the true interests of the Church, to a feeling which I believe to be founded on misapprehension and fomented by prejudice. At the same time I thank your Lordships for an interpellation which I believe to be intended for the public benefit.

"I have, &c., "J. RUSSELL.

"To the Right Rev. the Bishops of London, Winchester, Lincoln, &c."

An address, signed by 485 lay members of the Church (including several Peers, Members of Parliament, &c.), was also presented to the noble Premier, on Friday last, in which Dr. Hampden's elevation to the Episcopacy is represented as a matter of deep concern, and in which it is stated that "the appointment, if persisted in, will stir up feelings of bitterness which it would be impossible soon to eradicate, and which would probably lead to consequences which your Lordship would deprecate as earnestly as ourselves." His Lordship is then prayed to reconsider the case.

In his reply, Lord J. Russell states,

"I am aware that there exists a strong feeling on the part of some laymen and clergymen against Dr. Hampden; but the appointment should excite feelings of bitterness, is, I hope, an error, as it would show a sad want of Christian charity on the part of those who would indulge such feelings. The consequences with which I am threatened I am unable to encounter, as I believe the appointment will tend to strengthen the Protestant character of our Church, so seriously threatened of late by many defections to the Church of Rome."

The Bishop of Norwich has given his reasons why, on maturely considering the memorial which had been forwarded to him against the appointment of Dr. Hampden, he cannot sign that document. The right reverend Prelate's reasons are the same in effect as those of Lord J. Russell for not rescinding the appointment.

The Bishop of Exeter has also, on his own account, addressed a long letter to Lord John Russell, remonstrating against this appointment.

WHITEHALL, DEC. 11.—The Queen has been pleased to order a congé d'elire to pass the Great Seal of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, empowering the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral Church of Hereford to elect a Bishop of that see, the same being void by the translation of the most Reverend Father in God Doctor Thomas Musgrave, late Bishop thereof, to the see of York; and her Majesty has also been pleased to recommend the Reverend Henri Dickson Hampden, D.D., to be elected by the said Dean and Chapter Bishop of the said see of Hereford.

NEW CHURCH AT BROMPTON.—A few months ago the Rev. William Conway, curate of St. Nicholas, Rochester, made an app lication to the Hon. Board of Ordnance, for a site of ground to build a church upon. The board very munificently granted a piece, near to the Royal Military hospital, attached to the garrison, and the reverend gentleman has commenced the erection at his own individual expense. The estimated cost will be about £6000, and he intends endowing the sacred edifice with the sum of £90 per annum. The foundation-stone was laid by Miss Conway, sister of the rev. gent.eman, on Friday, the 10th inst., in the presence of about 40 private friends.

POSTSCRIPT.

HOUSE OF LORDS—FRIDAY.

THE CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND) BILL was read a third time and passed. The Royal Assent to be given on Monday.

THE PUBLIC WORKS (IRELAND) BILL was passed through Committee; and the Standing Orders having been suspended, the Bill was reported, read a third time, and passed.

THE RAILWAYS BILL was read a third time and passed.

Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

After the despatch of some preliminary business, the Adjourned Debate on the motion for going into Committee on the Civil and Political Disabilities of the Jews was resumed.

HER Majesty, it is said, is again in the most interesting condition in which a married queen can be placed: the time expected is about the end of March.

THE Marquis of Normanby left Hill-street yesterday (Friday) to resume his diplomatic duties at the British Embassy at Paris. The Marchioness left town on the preceding day on a visit to Lord Ravensworth, at Ravensworth Castle, Durham.

WE are glad to state that the Lord Chancellor is recovering his health steadily.

A CABINET COUNCIL was held yesterday (Friday) afternoon at the Foreign-office.

STOCKPORT ELECTION.—Close of the poll—Alderman Kershaw (Liberal), 845; Major Maxwland (Conservative), 818; Majority for Kershaw, 27.

NEWCASTLE-UNDER-LYNE ELECTION.—The following was the state of the poll at its close on Thursday afternoon—Christy, 546; Ross, 357: Majority for Christy, 179

THE Barristers' Annual Ball will be held at the Hanover-square Rooms on Thursday, the 30th inst. The proceeds are to be given in aid of the Distressed Needlewomen's Society. Amongst the list of Patronesses are the Duchess of Sutherland, Countess of Stradbroke, Lady Stanley, &c., who have commanded the quadrille "La Fille du Regiment" to be performed, in which set visitors in fancy costume only will be permitted to join.

THE RUMOURED THREATENING LETTER TO THE MARQUIS OF DROGHEDA.—The Marquis of Drogheda has addressed a letter to the Dublin Evening Mail, in denial of a paragraph which represented his Lordship to have been served with a threatening notice, in consequence of which he had determined upon leaving the country. Beyond the fact of a sheep having been killed in his demesne, the noble Marquis declares the other statements to be totally devoid of foundation.

ROBBERY OF DR. BOWRING.—The magistrates have committed two more prisoners for trial, on the charge of being concerned in the robbery of £1000 from Dr. Bowring and his brother.

THE MURDER OF MR. BELLCHAMBERS.—At the Old Bailey, on Thursday, Thomas Sale and George M'Coy, wine-coopers, aged respectively 25, were indicted of the murder of Mr. Bellchambers, near the Island street, Westminster, in October last. The other three prisoners, Thomas Doyle, John Lloyd, and Thomas Davis, were acquitted. The Judge (Wightman) in sentencing the two convicted prisoners to death, after observing that there could be no doubt that they had committed the murder imputed to them for the most base object, that of acquiring the property of the deceased, and that he entirely concurred in the verdict, sentenced them to be executed, without any hope of a commutation, of the sentence. The prisoners heard the sentence with perfect indifference, and Sale said he considered he had not had a fair trial. M'Coy also left the bar declaring that he was innocent.—Thomas Doyle, Thomas Davis, and John Lloyd, who had been acquitted on Thursday of the murder of Mr. Bellchambers, were placed in the dock yesterday charged with having committed a robbery on that gentleman; but as the evidence was defective, they were acquitted.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

FRANCE.

The Paris papers of Wednesday contain a report of a Reform banquet, held the evening before, at St. Denis, in the neighbourhood of Paris, a circumstance which attaches something like metropolitan importance to such a manifestation It appears that no fewer than 1100 persons were present, among whom were Odillon Barrot, Oscar Lafayette, M. Marie, the celebrated advocate; M. Dherbette, the member of the Chamber of Deputies who made himself so conspicuous by his accusations against the administrators of the State Forests; Messrs. Varin, Bellmont, Garnier Pages, and other deputies, with several persons of more or less note. All this company omitted to drink the King's health, for which was substituted the toast of "The National Sovereignty."

THE FRENCH MAILS.—We may at length congratulate the public on the actual settlement of the Post Office and Government scheme for facilitating the continental mails; al is now placed in what the Governments consider business order. It appears, then, that the chief part of the performance is to be accomplished on this side of the Channel, and, as usual, the railway is to do it.

The Government, we hear, have called on the South-Eastern Railway to run its express night mail from London to Dover as express speed, to do the distance of 86 miles in 24 hours. This train is to start from London Bridge at half past eight every night, and is to reach Dover at eleven. As soon as past eleven o'clock after the arrival of this train, the mail-steamer will sail from Dover for Boulogne with the London mails of that same night. The mail-steamers from Boulogne will sail at four o'clock every morning, and starting from Boulogne every morning at four will arrive in Dover harbour in time for the train which leaves at a quarter-past six, and arrives in London at ten minutes past ten; if not early enough for that, the express starts at eight, and reaches London at half-past ten in the morning; in the mail is, therefore, safe to arrive by one or other of those trains. This will be the second Paris mail, bringing news up to the latest hour of the previous evening. In addition to the Dover and Boulogne service there is to be, as we intimated some weeks since, a Dover and Calais service, by which route the first mail will arrive.

The mail-steamer will sail from Calais for Dover every night, at half-past nine o'clock, and sail from Dover for Calais every afternoon, at half past three o'clock. The steamers doing the Dover and Calais service are to be those of the French Government; and the mails between Boulogne and Dover are to be carried by steamers belonging to the British Government.

It is intended, and we believe arranged, that the early up-mail train of the South-Eastern Railway is to start from Dover at two o'clock in the morning, instead of its present hour. The speed of the train, also, is to be express-speed the whole distance to London, so that the train shall arrive at London-bridge at half past four every morning

These various arrangements are to come into operation on the 1st of January next.

UNITED STATES AND MEXICO

The Acadia, Capt. Shannon, arrived yesterday (Friday) evening at Liverpool, with dates from New York to Dec. 1; Boston, Dec. 1; and Halifax, Dec. 5. She brings £50,000 specie. The Britannia had not sailed out. The following is from the summary of the New York Courier and Inquirer:—

"In the city of Mexico, and in all the other cities and towns under the subjection of the Americans, everything was quiet. At Queretero, the arrival of members of Congress promised very soon the presence of a sufficient number to authorise deliberation upon the great question of peace or continued war. The designation of a President, however, would be their first duty, and the candidates most talked of were Pena y Pena, Almonte, and Herrera. Meantime, our convoys in force are steadily advancing from Vera Cruz to the capital, garrisoning the intermediate posts, and before the next steamer takes her departure we hope to be able to announce that the road is free, and the mail service regularly restored.

"On Monday next (Dec. 6), the Congress of the United States will assemble at Washington; and, if not delayed in the choice of a Speaker, will at once be organised, and the President's Message will be transmitted on Tuesday. Of its probable recommendations little can be known. More money and more men for the Mexican war will probably be called for."

STEAM-BOAT DISASTER.—The Philadelphia Daily News, in a telegraphic despatch from Pittsburg, says: "News has just reached here, by way of the Lakes, of a sad catastrophe which happened on Lake Michigan, by which nearly two hundred human beings have been hurried into an untimely grave. On Sunday morning last, the propeller Phœnix was bound up to the Lakes, was discovered to be on fire, when within nineteen miles of Sheboygan. The fire broke out under the deck, and a freak wind prevailing, spread with fearful rapidity. The flames were over two hours before the vessel was made on board, and the scene was heart-rending in the extreme. Some, in desperation, plunged into the lake—others, in their wild delirium, rushed headlong into the flames, in such a harrowing spectacle as humanity shudders at the recital of it. None of the passengers succeeded in escaping in the boats, and the rest either perished in the flames, or were drowned. One hundred and fifty of the passengers were German immigrants."

IRELAND.

THE CHANCELLOR. There is but little change in the malady under which his Lordship is suffering. The physicians are in constant attendance, and headline of the patient's progress are issued daily. That of the 13th states that the Chancellor passed a tolerably quiet night, and had not ,ost ground within the last 24 hours.

THE Attorney-General (Mr. Moore) has accepted the vacant seat on the bench, this will give one of the most consistent liberal Protestants at the bar, Mr. Hatchell, an advance step, as he will be the new Solicitor-General.

THE Commissioners of Education are about to erect a district model school in Dunmanway, the centre of a very large district in the West of Cork. The site is well chosen.

THE Athlone union is likely to be soon added to the nine already in the hands of the Commissioners. It appears that out of a rate of £2600, only £62 is half-year collected, leaving the enormous balance of £2538 still outstanding, with light hopes of bringing it into the union treasury. The highest sum paid by any one electoral division, of which there are 19 in the union, was £10, and the lowest £2 10s. The workhouse contains 1099 paupers.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—At Conciliation Hall the Repeal rent for the week was announced on Monday to be 23s. 1½d.

MR. COBDEN.—On Friday night, last week, at a meeting of the electors of Stockport, Mr. Cobden took leave of his former constituents, assigning as his reason for electing to sit for the West Riding, that, on his return from the Continent, when he found himself unexpectedly the member for two constituencies, although his own inclination led him—indeed, he might say, it was his determination not to accept the seat of representative for the West Riding, yet the opinions of his friends, and of the electors of Stockport, so far sahe could judge, had decided the question for him, and he had no alternative but to accept the seat for the West Riding. The hon. gentleman met with an enthusiastic reception from his old friends.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

EMIGRATION TO AUSTRALIA.—On Saturday afternoon a meeting of members of Parliament, and other gentlemen favourable to emigration to Australia, took place at No 8, Waterloo-place. Among the noblemen and gentlemen present were Lord Farnham, Colonel Matheson, M.P., Sir Edmund M'Naghten, Bart., M.P., Sir Thomas Mitchell, Surveyor-General of Australia, Sir Robert Ferguson, Bart., M.P., &c. The chair was taken by the Hon. F. Scott, M.P. Resolutions were adopted urging upon her Majesty's Government the propriety of giving pecuniary assistance in aid of an emigration to the colony on a large scale, in the conviction that the relief thus afforded to Ireland and Scotland, while it would secure a comfortable provision for the emigrants themselves, could not fail to lay the foundation of wealth and prosperity in no small part of her Majesty's dominions—the benefit of which the mother country would ultimately reap; and stating the belief of the meeting that the colony itself will liberally contribute to any measure of pecuniary aid which the Government of this country may sanction. A committee was appointed to carry out the views of the meeting.

THE MIDDLESEX HOSPITAL. On Monday a Special General Court of the Governors of this charity was held in the Board-room, Charles-street, Tottenham Court-road, to take into consideration the case of Mr. E. H. Tuson, one of the surgeons of the institution. Mr. B. B. Cabbell presided. There were also present—the Duke of Cambridge, Sir R. Inglis, M.P., Sir W. Stirling, Sir B. Smith, Sir E. Pearson, &c. &c., and nearly 100 Governors. The subject of investigation was a complaint against Mr. Tuson for having received money for defraying the expenses of pupils, and for not having therewith paid the fees for the lectures in the hospital, whereby the pupils had been obliged to pay the money out of their own pockets a second time, and also statements by Mr. Rowden and Mr. Core, co-lecturers with Mr. Tuson, complaining that he had not duly accounted to them for various fees. The proceedings resulted in the following resolution put by Mr. Hawes: "We, the undersigned, feel strongly the importance of waiving every individual feeling for the security of the hospital, and we deem it right to declare further contention, and to place our resignation in the hands of the weekly board at the next meeting." This, which was signed by all the surgeons of the establishment, was carried. The officers will offer themselves for re-election, and it will then be for the Governors to say whether they will re-elect Mr. Tuson.

NATIONAL PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.—On Wednesday, the annual meeting of this institution took place at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street. S. H. Lucas, Esq., presided. The report was of much interest, and highly favourable. It appeared that the policies were now upwards of 7000, and ordered to be carried into immediate execution. It was announced to the meeting that his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge had sent a donation of £10 towards the funds, and the Lord Bishop of Durham another to the same amount.

SCULPTURE.—BY MR. GEORGE G. ADAMS.—"MURDER OF THE INNOCENTS."

THE HUSSITE PREACHER.

PAINTED BY LESSING.

JOHN HUSS was one of the many precursors of the Reformation, who, being born a century too soon, won but a crown of martyrdom for the wreath of victory. He prepared the way for Luther. But the Germans and Bohemians the establishment of the New Faith cost nearly half a century of war, bloodshed and devastation. John Huss was burned at the stake on the 6th of July 1415. As he had attended the summons of the Council of Constance under a safeguard from the Emperor, his death excited in Bohemia the wildest spirit of revenge. The Reformers revolted, and, headed by John Ziska (the one-eyed), a man who joined extraordinary military talent to the deepest religious fanaticism—a Bohemian Cromwell—defeated all the armies which the Kings of Bohemia, Wenzel and Sigismund, backed by the Pope, could bring against them. They took the city of Prague, and established, on a tongue of land formed by a bend of the river Molden, a settlement, called Mount Tabor. From this as from a centre, the Hussites ravaged Bohemia, and made incursions into the centre of Germany, for a period of thirty years. The wildest and most savage spirit of fanaticism raged among them, and it was directed with such skill by Ziska, that, for an entire generation, they were really invincible. But the same spirit produced divisions among them: Mount Tabor became the source from whence sprang those sects whose strange, repulsive, and often disgusting principles and practices, startled Europe in the middle ages, and actually retarded the progress of the Reformation, which Huss began by rejecting the doctrine and authority of the Church of Rome.

The picture of Lessing represents a scene from the period when the Hussites, in all the madness of religious fanaticism and political revolution, were ravaging their own country, and spreading destruction and terror around them. Huss, the martyr, little thought how he would be avenged, or to what excesses his teachings would carry his fellow citizens. The learned Professor and pacific school-man, who braved death for his creed, would probably have shrunk with horror from his savage successors, who preached to congregations kneeling in the lurid light of burning towns, with weapons still dropping blood. Many such a scene as the artist has imagined must have occurred. The Hussites went forth not as an army only, but as a society; their encampments, fortified with their waggons, included both sexes and all ages; the "cup" was their standard and emblem, and the painter has denoted the chief tenet of the sect by placing the chalice in the hand of the preacher, who raises it aloft with enthusiasm. The various weapons, from the lance of the well-armed Knight, to the spiked flail of the peasant, show the mixture of ranks; the burning town in the distance speaks of the exterminating spirit that animated all.

The Reformation was most destructive to the material prosperity of Germany. It was preceded by the war of the Hussites; it was followed in another century by the thirty years war under Tilly and Wallenstein, and of which Gustavus Adolphus was the Ziska, without the success of the old blind fanatic. In that war, all the old freedom of Germany, her middle-age charters and institutions, were lost, and millions of people feel the effects of the religious fury of their fathers to the present hour.

THE "LADY KENNAWAY."

Great interest has been excited in the Mercantile Marine by the recent abandonment of the ship Lady Kennaway by her master and crew and the subsequent falling in of two Danish ships with the derelict vessel, who, with the assistance of other seamen, succeeded in towing the vessel into Plymouth harbour.

It appears that the Nayaden barque and the Industrie brig fell in with the Lady Kennaway in 47° 4′ N. lat., and 8° 31′ W. long.; the latter having been seen for some time, without a single sail set, rather an extraordinary circumstance in the Bay of Biscay. The crews of the Nayaden and the Industrie, having boarded the Kennaway, found everything in the greatest confusion, and no one on board. They then debated as to what was best to be done, and determined to try and save her, at all hazards.

They immediately set to work, by clearing the decks. Nearly every sail was gone, having, apparently, been cut away from the yards, as was, also, most of her running rigging. They, however, found a main top-sail, which they soon bent, and, having been supplied with a fore-sail, fortemast-stay-sail, from the Industrie, they proceeded to rig out a spar as a temporary rudder. The mates, carpenters, and a seaman from each vessel being left on board, both vessels proceeded to new her, which was persevered in, to their great danger for about thirty hours. The Nayaden did, but, in consequence of the warps and hawsers not being strong enough, and the wind increasing, they were obliged to cast her off. The Industrie being much shattered and leaky, the captain left his people and sails on board the Lady Kennaway, with the understanding, that the Nayaden should remain by her, and tow her into Falmouth.

On the 24th of November, when in lat. 46° 48′ N., and long. 7° 38′ W., her Majesty's brigantine, Dolphin, Hon. Commander Boyle, hove in sight, and sent a midshipman and seven seamen to assist in towing with a hawser; the help of which was brought on board the Nayaden, who then pursued her course. Two rudders had been fitted, but carried away; the third was fixed on Monday, Nov. 29, when it began to blow very hard from the westward, and the Nayaden was again obliged to cast her off, having torn away her bulwarks, and in lat. 49° 9′ N., long. 8° 12′ W., lost sight of her. From that time until Wednesday, the 1st December, they met with a succession of heavy gales; and it may be easily imagined the endurance and hardships this brave little band of Danes, assisted by the English officer and sailors, underwent, when we state that it required six men, nearly half the crew, to steer her. They then made the Start Point, and were boarded by Mr. R. Stibbs, pilot of Plymouth, who, in order to steer her, was obliged to take his own vessel in tow. Her Majesty's steamer, Confidence, which had been despatched by Sir J. West, the Admiral at Plymouth in quest of her, fell in with, and, having taken her in tow, brought her into Plymouth about seven o'clock on Thursday morning.

When first the Danish captains and seamen boarded the Lady Kennaway, to their great surprise, there were but fifteen or sixteen inches of water in the hold, which was freed in about ten minutes, the pumps working admirably. Our artist saw the vessel, with thirty-one hours' water in her, pumped dry in less than a minute and a half!

She is little damaged, but has evidently been plundered, as the fife-rails of poop, top of the capstan, and other deck-fittings, which were of brass, are taken; the cuddy and cabins have been ransacked; bunks heads knocked down; the table, and everything in the shape of valuables, gone; and a bottle of madeira was the only thing in the shape of provisions left on board. It is said there were about £10,000 worth of silks and shawls on board, but not a vestige of them was found. The cargo, which consists of cotton, rice, and coffee, is but little injured, and, together with the ship, is estimated at £20,000.

We trust that a handsome salvage will reward these brave men for the unceasing toil and hardships they have undergone. The claims of the Danes are entrusted in the hands of W. Fry, Esq., Lloyd's, Esq., the enclosed Consul at Falmouth. The Danes are said to claim £100,000 salvage, and the Dolphin, £25,000.

The commander and crew of the Lady Kennaway, in justification of their abandonment of the ship, intend to enter a protest relating all the circumstances of the affair, and Captain Avery, Mr. Walsh, and the second and third mates, and the whole of the crew, twenty-two in number, have signed their names to a statement, which is totally at variance with many of the accounts already published. This statement is an extract from the ship's log, and was read over to the men before they affixed their signatures to it. It is too lengthy for quotation here, but, we give its main points:—

"On the 3rd of June, 1847, I left Bombay in the barque Lady Kennaway, bound to London. Nothing material occurred after leaving the island of Ceylon, when, on the 2nd of November, we had a strong gale from N.E. to N.N.W., which lasted about forty hours. We had light winds up to Sunday, Nov. 7th, which commenced with fresh increasing breezes, with fine weather at noon; it blew a fresh gale, with thick weather, from the S.W., at 10 P.M.; it blew a perfect gale from midnight up to the time of my losing the rudder

"On Monday, November 8th, between the hours of 10 P.M. and 7 A.M., in a heavy gale of wind from S.W., we lost the maintop-sail from the close reef, the foretopmast staysail, and greater part of the main-trysail, the ship being hove to with the spind e of the rudder carried away. I immediately secured it as well as was possible in the poop, and commenced clearing away the after part of the between decks, to enable us to ship a tiller, which was accomplished in about two hours. Just as we were ready to ship it, the rudder went away altogether, the ship labouring violently, and making a great quantity of water al across the stern frame, so as to keep both the pumps constantly going. I mustered the officers and crew and consulted with them what was best to be done, and it was unanimously thought expedient, for the safety of the major part of the cargo, to lighten the ship aft by throwing a part of it overboard, which occupied us until ten o'clock on Tuesday morning, when I had a still smaller rudder over water.

"11 A.M., Tuesday, it still blowing very hard, the ship labouring very heavily, we with much difficulty got a spar off the boom, and commenced constructing a rudder. Saw two brigs and one schooner standing to the westward, and every signal for assistance, hoisted and fired guns, but they took no notice of us. The ship made a great quantity of water; guns were fired, and lights burned all night.

"On Wednesday morning, the rudder was completed, when ten and eleven o'clock, we got it over the stern. At daylight, saw three brigs and two schooners were standing by the wind to the W.S.W., made every signal for assistance, which must have been seen by the two nearest of them, they being at the time not more than six miles from us; but none of them attempted to come towards us, myself and crew exerting much useless energy to get the rudder properly secured, but from the want of gear, and from the sea, and the heavy sea on, we were unable to effect it. At noon, the Belgian schooner La Meuse, Captain J. F. Jones, hove in sight, and, observing our signals, and the crippled appearance of the ship, bore down to us. I hailed him, and stated our condition to him, and asked him to remain by me until I could communicate with him. The French brig Daphne, of Havre, also bore down to us with the schooner Daphne, of Brixham. I had the jolly boat lowered, and went on board La Meuse, and endeavoured to get the captain to take me in tow; but, La Meuse being much deeper than the ship, and, in fact, in sight to hold the ship many minutes, providing we had cables to do it with, which we had not, he declined, and strongly advised me to save the lives of the crew. I again, with much difficulty, on account of the high sea running, returned on board. During my absence, the French brig Meneves was hailed by the chief officer for assistance; he said he could not take us in tow, but would take our crew, if we liked. The schooner Daphne, of Brixham, came under our stern. I asked him for assistance to take me in tow, in conjunction with La Meuse. I asked him to send his boat on board; he said he could not send either boat, but he would take away the crew, if I liked. I asked him to stay by me; he hauled his wind, and stood away to some distance, so that it was impossible for me to communicate with him, having no boats. * * * *

"After consulting with the whole of the officers, all concurred in one opinion, and I consented to send the disabled people, with the clothes of the crew, on board La Meuse. I sent Mr. M'Birney, the second officer, away with some hands, including those disabled, to assist in getting her long-boat out, which was iron; at four P.M., the jolly-boat and iron launch returned, and but a few things were put into her in consequence of the sea running, with which, with much difficulty, they reached the schooner, the jolly-boat being so much damaged as to be incapable of returning. At eight P.M., the sea being so high the iron boat went down, and was lost; people most constantly at the pumps. At nine P.M., the rudder hanging over her stern, straining the ship so violently in consequence of a great portion of the gear having been carried away, I gave orders for it to be cut away, which was accomplished; for La Meuse keeping close to us at times within hail, the captain advising me strongly to leave the ship, for, it was his opinion, we should have a gale of wind before many hours. The schooner Daphne lost in sight after eight P.M. The French brig Meneves lying some distance to leeward. At daylight, Captain Jipsen of La Meuse hailed me to urge me to come on board. The schooner Daphne about seven miles on our weather bow, and another vessel in sight, at daylight, I gave orders to hoist the cutter and long boat up as well as it was possible, they being at that time not capable of swimming. The La Meuse not having any boat that she could send to communicate with me, in about three hours the long boat was got over the side, and most of the men's clothes that remained put into her with some of my own. The Meuse being close under our lee-beam, the schooner Daphne bore up and came down under the stern. I again consented him to give me assistance, in conjunction with La Meuse, to tow the ship while the weather was no worse. He said he could not. I asked him to send his boat on board several times, as I had now of my own to leave, and that I would guarantee £100 for his assistance, if he would but take the ship in tow; he said he could not, neither could he put his boat out, at the same time having a splendid boat on his decks; he wore the vessel round, and stood away too far for my two scattered boats to reach him, telling me, if I liked, he would take the crew.

"The weather coming on very dirty, and the sea rising, I was compelled to let the long boat go into the water; she was no sooner there than she was half full; they made for the schooner La Meuse, and, just as they reached her side, she went down with everything in her, but no lives were lost. In about an hour, the cutter was put over, and the remainder of the people's clothes, with our small stock of provisions remaining, put into her, and sent away, seeing no hopes of any timely assistance. A few minutes afterwards, I saw a smack to windward running down; I made signals to her, and she came to and spoke us. I boarded her and got on board, but was forced to let the boat go, being nearly full of water; the schooner La Meuse made sail up to us, and sent a small boat for me, stating he would bring me into Ostend. When I left the ship, she had two or four inches water in the pump well; being so much by the head, I supposed, by the appearance of her, to have at least four or five feet of water in the fore part, for to all appearance she was settling by the head since daylight. I then left the first officer, Mr. Walsh, Mr. Brown, third mate, and four of the crew, in the smack, in case anything should detain the schooner.

"To the truth of this the whole of the crew and officers are ready to attest on their oaths, and have affixed their names hereunto"

The sketch, by Mr. N. M. Condy, represents the Lady Kennaway in tow of the Danish vessels, with the temporary rudder they had fitted; to do which, they had to saw through her decks, which, to add to their difficulties, were made of teak wood.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"M. J."—We had not overlooked your question, but could hardly imagine you were in earnest. What would be said to such a procedure at giving the names of several private gentlemen, accompanied by comments on their age, looks, personal deportment, and acquirements, in a public newspaper, simply to gratify the curiosity of a few amiable admirers? The proposed name is very appropriate. We shall hope to hear from you again.

LITERATURE.

THE BOOK OF BEAUTY; OR, REGAL GALLERY. Edited by the Countess of BLESSINGTON. Bogue.

The present popularity of historic memoir has, in all probability, led to its adoption in the "Book of Beauty" for the forthcoming year. The lives of the Queens of England have been selected for this occasion, and the choice is, certainly, a happy one for a drawing room volume like that before us. Thus, we have Memoirs of Anne Boleyn, Jane Seymour, Catharine Parr, Berengaria, Elizabeth Woodville, Caroline (George II.), Eleanor of Provence, Matilda of Scotland, Philippa of Hainault, Henrietta Maria of France, Eleanor of Castile, and Isabella of Valois. To each life is a portrait, engraved in superb style, under the superintendence of Mr. Heath, the majority from drawings by Mr. J. W. Wright.

The biographic sketches are much nearer to our taste than insipid nouvellettes, and futile attempts to be smart, such as have hitherto served to fill the Annuals. In the historic memoir there is much to inform as well as charm the mind and heart of the attentive reader: while there is enough of romance in the career of our female Sovereigns to interest every one. On this account, we prefer these biographettes to the fiction-lumber of past years

The Memoirs are from several pens: we quote a passage from that of Jane Seymour, by the Countess of Blessington: it is very nicely written throughout:

"Jane Seymour had acquired wisdom by the example furnished during the reign of her unhappy predecessor. Without the natural gaiety and ready wit so apt to encroach on the dignity of a Queen, and so dangerous in the wife of a moody and suspicious husband, for which Anne Boleyn was so remarkable, Jane was not tempted into any of those levities and reparties which the possession of these fascinating qualities but too often induces. Calm and discreet, no less by acquired prudence than by natural temperament, she observed a dignified and queen-like demeanour to strangers, and a tenderness and familiarity, if she captivated few, she offended none, but pursued the even tenour of her way, satisfied with her high estate, and by no means disposed to do aught that could risk its loss by incurring the displeasure of her lord and master."

The details of the close of Jane's life, and her funeral, are thus related:—

"On the 12th of October, 1537, Jane gave birth to Prince Edward, in Hampton-court Palace; an event which filled the king with transport, and, consequently, delighted his courtiers. His joy was manifested by noisy hilarity, and theirs by an affectation of irrepressible rapture. This turbulent joy, however gratifying to give way to grave reflections, soon came to sadden her in the weak state to which she had been reduced; and the christening, which followed only three days after, from a portion of which splendid, but tedious, ceremony she was not debarred by her weakness, proved to her nearly the last exhausted trains. This solemn rite took place at midnight in the chapel of Hampton Court, with all the etiquette peculiar to such occasions; and, when concluded, the infant Prince was borne back in regal pomp to the arms of his mother, attended by a stately procession, heralded by loud clarions, and as loud shouts of rejoicing—a terrible trial to the Queen in her state of languor, and from the effects of which she never recovered. In twelve days after her confinement she resigned her breath, ere yet satisfy had weaned from her the affection of her fickle husband, and while he was still rejoicing in the birth of his new-born heir. Henry, albeit unused to give way to grief, was not without some compunctious visitings for his lost Queen. He wore mourning for her three months, an honour he never paid to any of her predecessors or successors, and his courtiers observed the same etiquette. Doubtless terms of mourning, in those days, were not chosen to think, he derived from the word devil, which signifies the same. All respect and honours were shown to the remains of the departed Queen."

We need scarcely add that the work is produced in first rate taste in the illustrative department. The portraits are spirited compositions, due regard being paid to costume and other characteristic accessories; and the volume is incased in a right regal binding, chaste with a very appropriate design.

FACTS FROM THE WORLD OF NATURE, ANIMATE AND INANIMATE. By MRS. LOUDON. Grant and Griffith.

A clever selection from the Wonders of Creation, described in simple yet comprehensive language, admirably adapted for children. It comprises the Curiosities of the Earth, the Water, the Atmosphere, and Animal Life. The staple of the volume is the best accounts of the objects, from journals of voyages and travel, where the writer's own observation has not been exercised. It abounds with adventure and lively narrative, with description, and quaint truth—all which must prove very effective on what Mrs. Loudon terms "the yielding, and impressible mind of childhood." As a compilation, the book is artistically executed; and the writing is clear and simple, it is directed observant in the right direction, for the instruction as well as the entertainment of the young reader. The infinity of sublime objects in Nature's broad volume has yielded abundant attraction. We have the first reading of a first tracking of mountain summits, trodden but by few human feet; of volcanoes vomiting fire, as late philosophy teaches us, from earth's very centre; of caverns, the true romance of Nature; and of the ocean, overpowering in its mighty cities, the pride of man's handiwork; of the ocean and its mighty inmates; of rivers, as accessory to man's ingenuity; of cataracts and their destructive agencies; and of icebergs, whose millions of tons crush the pretender down in an instant; of the blazing splendours of the atmosphere, and the rush and roar of winds; and of the biography of the animal world, which shows instinct allied to reason, in traits akin to creature's hard. The great truths sought to be impressed by Mrs. Loudon in the book before us, by means of graceful encyclopædian writing, and authoritative testimony of pen and pencil the latter in several engravings of able design and execution.

VACHER'S PARLIAMENTARY COMPANION. Vacher and Sons.

This work is prevented especially to all engaged in the progress of Private Bills through Parliament. It contains Lists of the Cabinet, and of Government Officers; of the Peers and the Commons, and their Town Residences; of the Irish Peers, and Irish Members; of Parliamentary Committees; Analyses of and Comparative Statements relating to the New Parliament; Lists of Parliament, Privy Council, &c. Prefixed to "the Companion," are the lithographed Autographs of her Majesty and the Cabinet Ministers.

THE PARLIAMENT ALMANACK FOR 1848. Vacher and Sons.

Besides the Calendar, this closely packed sheet bears Lists of the 453 Peers, and of the 656 Members of the House of Commons, England, 499; Wales, 29; Scotland, 53; Ireland, 105; arranged according to counties. There are, also, Lists of the Officers of the Houses of Parliament, and principal Public Offices; of the Royal Family, Ministry, Ambassadors, &c., all at one glance.

THE BOOKSELLERS' ALMANACK FOR 1848. Aylott and Jones.

This is one of the numerous class Almanacks that have resulted from the abolition of the stamp duty. It is printed on a sheet; and, besides the Calendar and customary Business Lists, bears a large and handsome Engraving, by Bolton, of the Booksellers' Provident Retreat, at Abbots Langley; with the Rules and Lists of Officers and Subscribers to that excellent institution. It is very neatly printed by Whittingham.

THE COMIC ALMANACK FOR 1849. With Illustrations by GEORGE CRUIKSHANK.

The price of this annua, budget of drolleries has been, according to the tariff of the times, reduced to one shilling. It has, however, the usual modicum of fun and patter, and embellishments from the pencil of George Cruikshank, who is still unrivalled in his line of comic illustration. We have culled a few of the wit samples:—

"NEW YEAR'S DAY.—Now kill your dragon, for the friendly game of snap, and hire your blindman, only take care he is a good buffer. Now get your needle ready for the purpose of threading; and hunt everywhere for a slipper; only if there is a wood pavement in the neighbourhood, you need not go far to pick up one. Now riddle your company well with conundrums, and bore them with acting charades, till every one is tired of the fun, and falls down and gives it up."

"HOW TO DRESS FOR NOTHING.—Go to an advertising tailor, and get him to take out your clothes in poetry. The same with your hatter, bootmaker, and hosier. Your poetry must be very poor stuff if you cannot get a suit of clothes out of it; and its feet must be lame indeed if they do not afford you a pair of Wellingtons."

"Why are the Protectionists like walnuts? It cause they are very troublesome to Peel."

"If there were no 'ifs' in the world, there would be no arguments; no rules of three; no political economy; no more speculations about the fate of Europe if England had lost the battle of Waterloo (if it had, several shareholders would never have lost their money on Waterloo-bridge, by-the-bye); no more letters from Joseph Ady about certain valuable information if a sovereign is sent by return of post; no more liberal promises from fathers as to what they will do if their sons will only improve, and keep good hours; no more financial experiments like Robert Peel's—for there was only one chancellor who ever elongated 'if,' and its repeal is a still more extended one); and, lastly, this clever little article upon 'if' never would have been written, if there had been no such word in the language as 'if.'"

"HINTS TO AGRICULTURAL SOCIETIES.—About November stuff your calves for approaching show, and put the tails of your pigs over night into curl papers. Rub a little bear's grease on the head of your sheep, and pass small-tooth-combs through their fleecy wool. Wash your Southdowns in warm soap and water, and let your little porkers have a good slathering, particularly about the chops. Trim your cows with satin ribbands, part the hair on their foreheads down the middle, and fix it with bandoline. Black the hoofs of your bulls, stir up your Durhams well, and see that they are properly mustered."

"AGRICULTURAL SPORTS.—Let a gentleman catch your prize labourer, and joke him at your annual Show, put him on a platform, and make good quiet fun of his having brought up sixteen children on five shillings a week for twenty years. Compliment him most highly on his sobriety, and all the cardinal virtues, and give him a good-natured dig about his little potato ground. Give him a glass of wine and five shillings, and, when you are tired of the absurdity, tell him to sit down, and call up your fattest pig and bull, and sustain the rollick of the day's amusements by awarding them premiums of £10 and £15 each. This is capital sport, and gentlefolks come far and near to see it; only we doubt if the poor labourer sees exactly the fun of it."

It will thus be seen that the foolories of the day, and their authors, are not spared. The physic is, at least, pleasant to take.

HOWLETT'S VICTORIA GOLDEN ALMANACK FOR 1848.

This elegant bijou measures but three by two inches. It is printed in gold, upon an ivory-surfaced paper, and enclosed in a wrapper of regal purple and gold, or in an enamelled boarding, beautifully executed.

FINE ARTS.

FLOWERS AND THEIR KINDRED THOUGHTS. Poetry by M. A. BACON. Designs by OWEN JONES. Illuminated by Owen and Co.

Of the exquisite taste in which this work is produced we can, by description, convey to the reader but an imperfect idea: to our thinking it appears the ne plus ultra of chastely elegant design and masterly execution. We will, however, strive to detail its perfection.

The aim is to illustrate the association of Flowers with certain passions and phases of human excellence—thus:—

Snowdrop	Hope.	Honeysuckle	Constancy.
Princess	Innocence.	Carnation	Fascination.
Violet	Modesty.	Convolvulus	Timidity.
Hare-bell and Pimpernel	Childish Folly.	Fuchsia	Fine Taste.
Lilies of the Valley ..	Humility.	Laurel	Treachery.
Hawthorn	Joy.	Honeysuckle	Remembrance.
Rose	Love.	Holly	Friendship.

Of each of these Flowers there is a large illustration coloured after nature, with the name of the flower printed in gold; and the opposite page bears the appropriate stanzas, also printed in gold. The paper is of warm sienna tint, which gives additional richness to the gold printing, as well as to the colors of the flowers. This transition from garish white to warm tint in paper, we are glad to see adopted in many fine specimens of book printing.

The Artist's share in the production of this work is extended to the binding, the inside facings are vine-branches printed in gold upon satin-net paper; and the outer cover is of light amber-coloured leather, boldly stamped with foliage, trellis work, and rustic lettering. The title, too, is gold-printed rustic, intertwined with forget-me-not and pimpernel in gorgeous yet elegant contrast; the trailing of the plants, and their intermingling with the lettering is the work of pure fancy. The tail-piece indicates the important withdrawn ivy. The designs are by Owen Jones, and the drawing on stone by E. L. Bateman.

The poetical accompaniments are feelingly written with a tinge of olden rhyme; the introductory paragraph is—

> "Bind up thy thoughts as then wouldst bind thy flowers;
> Weed them, and then shall brighten thy harvest."

We quote the stanzas on Holly—Friendship:—

> "The Year doth bend her garland up with thee,
> Rough predict of a hale and healthy tree!
> Through Winter's sleet she bids thee shine out free,
> Under a sacred name.
> We give it from the heart! For thus in grief,
> When life hath fall'n into the yellow leaf,
> And through its snows we look to find relief—
> Friendship will do the same."

We need scarcely add our warm commendation of this beautiful work: as a Christmas gift, it will soon become very popular; and a more acceptable ornament for the encoignure, the drawing-room or the boudoir-table, it would scarcely be possible to devise.

MODEL OF SHAKESPEARE'S HOUSE. Modelled by EGERTON J. FILMORE.

This fac-simile memorial of our great Dramatic Poet's House, in Henley-street, Stratford-upon-Avon, has but one slight drawback in design: it represents a detached house, with half-timbered gable-ends, whereas, the accredited birthplace is now but a tenement, joined on each side by other dwellings: this, it must be allowed, in some measure, detracts from the identity of the subject; the other details are, however, very correct, even to the inscription board beneath Shakespeare's birth-room window; the footpath, &c. It is very nicely executed, in the raw material called Parian, if we mistake not; it has the elegant purity of wax, and, mounted upon ground glass, beneath a glass shade, the Model will form a pleasing drawing-room or library ornament; presenting, at the same time, an interesting memorial of genius, and a novel specimen of improved manufacture. The platform of the house is about 4½ inches square, and the height 4 inches, of the stand 7 inches square; height of stand and shade, 7 inches. The Artist's property, we perceive, is registered.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

There has been no alteration in the value of money during the past week although a scarcity exists with respect to the ordinary modes of obtaining credit for short dates. Bills are scarcely to be had, and this tends to make the Stock Exchange the great medium for lending: Stock and Exchequer Bills (after good commercial bills) being considered the safest security. Under this, and consequently been so plentiful in the Stock Market, that in many cases borrowers could not be found. At present it ranges at about four per cent. The upward tendency of Consols is owing to be attributed to this cause.

By the Indian Mail, which arrived on Tuesday, it is ascertained that intelligence of the failures of Gomuell, Brothers; Gower, Nephews; Read, Irvine, and Co.; Jackson; Perfect, and Co.; Cowasjee Nanabhoy and Co.; Cowasjee Dinshaw Brothers; Samuel Phi lips and Co.; Thomas, Son, and Lefevre, and De Jersey was not considered in Bombay, but "the most perfect confidence" was felt in the houses of the Union Bank of India to maintain their credit. It must be remembered, however, that it was not from Bombay that any remittances could have looked for, as no intelligence had been published of the various failed houses showing their undertakings to have been carried on almost entirely with Bengal, Canton, or the Mauritius. It is also to be noticed that the news of the failures was published on the 27th of November, and only the present mail was despatched on the 13th, so that only three or four days had elapsed during which any of its consequences could have transpired. Such a period is inadequate to admit of any accurate estimate of the actual position of affairs, even if there had been reason to anticipate results of importance.

The failures of Rickards, Little, and Co., Barclay, Brothers; Lawrence Philips and Sons; Scott, Bell, and Co.; Thurburn and Co.; Johnson, Cole, and Co.; Leicestersteen and Co.; and some others, were still unknown.

The balance-sheet of Messrs. Truesman and Cooke has been handed to the Bank of England, and it shows the firm to be in a position to pay 20s. in the pound, but, at the same time, as delay will be necessary to this end, it demonstrates the necessity for their stoppage at the period when that step was decided on. A meeting of creditors will be held in the course of a few days, when it is expected that a proposition will be submitted to discharge 4*l.* claims by instalments, running from next month up to February, 1849.

The suspension of C. de Bruyn and Sons, of Amsterdam, announced in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of last week, has caused the annexed abstract of the balance sheet to be laid before the creditors, on the occasion of their application for time to meet their engagements:

	Assets.	Liabilities.
	Florins.	Florins.
Sugar refinery, &c.	2,267,972 67½	2,284,732 50½
Gasworks	893,554 14½	482,328 57½
Estimated surplus balance	..	1,084,513 24
	3,851,633 82	3,851,633 82

At a meeting of the creditors of Messrs. Leaf, Barnett, Scotson, and Co. on Wednesday, the accounts presented showed the firm to be solvent, with a surplus of £3500, but, it was explained by Mr Lloyd, the professional representative of the suspended firm, that a considerable advowance must be made for depreciation in realising the stock, as well as for a large amount of bad debts. Under the circumstances of the case, the offer Leaf, Barnett, and Co., felt themselves competent to make, should the creditors not manifest a disposition to pursue any other course of action, was in the pound, payable by equal instalments (with security for the last), at three, six, and nine months. This proposal, however, did not meet with the approval of the meeting.

It appeared that Captain Carnegie is a claimant against Leaf, Barnett, and Co., for £12,200, on which he is entitled to rank equally with all other creditors, and it seemed to be a question whether he would consent to a delay in the receipt of his dividends to accommodate the other parties having claims on the estate. After much conversation a creditor suggested that the shortest way of coming to a definitive understanding on the point was to reject the offer, and ascertain if it 17*s.* 6*d.* would be accepted. A committee of four creditors, after consulting the partners on this amended proposition, returned, and stated as the result, that having carefully weighed the whole circumstances, they were prepared to urge upon the necessary steps to obtain, if possible, security for the last instalment, resolutions were passed authorising proceedings for a compromise on the terms stated. In conclusion, testimony was borne by the creditors to the correctness of the whole of the business transactions of the suspended firm.

It was determined, at a meeting held on Wednesday, of the creditors of Gates, Coats, Barclay, & Co., warehousemen, of Watling-street, to administer to the estate in bankruptcy, their offer for a composition being only 2*s.* 6*d.* in the pound. The accounts presented on this occasion exhibited debts to the amount of £13,000, and assets, £7,000.

A dividend of 2*s.* 6*d.* in the pound, on the estate of Lesley, Alexander, and Co., will be paid early in next month.

Messrs. Scott, Bell, and Co., propose to pay, under inspection, twenty shillings in the pound, in four half-yearly instalments, commencing the 3rd of June next.

On Monday, the English Funds opened buoyantly, at an advance of ¼ per cent, which was maintained. The first quotation was 86¾ ⅞ cum div. for the account in January; the books being closed for transfer until the 18th of that month. After a momentary rise to 85¾, the closing price was as above. The supposed insecurity of Mr Cunard's position, owing to the Parliamentary delay, had a slightly depressing effect on Tuesday; but the unlooked-for arrival of the Indian Mail, with better news than could have been anticipated, caused prices to close at an improvement. Scarcely any variation occurred on Wednesday, prices ranging from 85¾ ⅞ to 86¾ ⅞, at which quotation they closed. Thursday's Market opened with Consols at 86¾, but afterwards declined to 86¼. A reaction, however, changed the value to 86¾. Exchequer Bills have improved somewhat, and are the at the week's advances. Bank Stock has somewhat advanced, but India Bonds still continue at 21*s.* discount. The current values are for Bank Stock, 198; Three per Cent. Reduced, 84¾; Three per Cent. Consols 86¼ New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cent. Annuities, 86¾; Long Annuities, 3 9-16; India Bonds, £1000, 1*b* 6*d.*; Ditto, under £1000, 1*b* 6*d.*; Consols for Account, 86¼; Exchequer Bills £1000, 10 p. ; £500, 11 p.; Small, 13 p.

On Monday and Tuesday there was scarcely any animation in the Foreign Market, with the exception of a slight demand for Mexican, which was done at the advance of 1¾ for Account. This price was well maintained on Wednesday, and prices generally showed an upward tendency. Spanish and Dutch have improved, and an unusual amount of business was done on Thursday, the settlement of the half-monthly account passing off favourably. Prices at the close of the week are for Brazilian, 80; Ditto, New, 1839 and 1839, 79; Chilian Bonds, 6 per Cent, 89¾; Ditto, 3 per Cent, 49; Equador Bonds, 3½; Granada Bonds, 1 per Cent, 18; Ditto, Deferred, 3¾; Mexican, 5 per Cent, 1846, 18¾; Peruvian Bonds, 6 per Cent, 99; Portuguese, 4 per Cent, New, 41; Russian, 5 per Cent, 1822, Spanish 5 per Cent, 17¾; Ditto, Passive, 3¾; Ditto, Deferred, 4 , 1 ; Ditto, 3 per Cent, 29; Ditto, Account, 29¾; Venezuela Bonds, 5 , per Cent, 11¾; Ditto, Deferred, 10; Dutch, 4 per Cent Certificates, 94.

The Railway Market closes not quite so buoyantly as it was at the commencement of the week. Prices are: Ambergate, Nottingham, Boston, and Eastern Junction, 4¾; Birmingham and Oxford Junction, 7¾; Birmingham, Wolverhampton, and Dudley, 13¾; Bristol and Exeter, 68; Ditto, Thirds, 1½; Buckinghamshire, 3¾; Caledonian, 30¾; Ditto, Half Shares, 18; Chester and Holyhead, 9¼; Eastern Counties, 1¾; Ditto, York Extension, 8¾; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 46¾; Great Northern, 44; Great Western, 99; Ditto, Half Shares, 86¾; Ditto, Quarter Shares, 17; Ditto, New, 2*l.* 7*l.*; Ipswich and Bury St. Edmunds, 34; Lancaster and Carlisle, 20; Ditto, Fifths, 2; Ditto, Fifths, 7¾; Ditto (West Riding Union) 2¾ ; Leeds and Bradford, 91¾; London, Brighton, and South Coast, 43; London and North Western, 18 ; Ditto, ditto, New, 7¼; Ditto Fifths, 1¼; Ditto, £40 (M. and B.), 60; Ditto, £10. (M. and B.) A., 12; Ditto, £10 (M. and B.) B., 11¾; Ditto, £5 (M. and B.) C., 5¾; London and South Western, 61 6s. 6*d.*, 84 xd.; Ditto, New Consol 8½, 41¾; Ditto, New £50, 37 x.d.; Ditto, Twelfths, 1 ; Ditto, York, 39 ; Ditto, York Extension, 8¾; Midland, 108; Ditto £40 Shares, 42¾; Ditto, £50 Shares, 8; Ditto, Birmingham and Derby, 62; Midland Consol., Bristol and Birmingham, six per cent, 119¾; Norfolk, 7¾; Ditto, Fifths, British, 2¼; Ditto, Staffordshire, 7 ; Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton, 19¾; Reading, Guildford, and Reigate, 7; South Devon, Preference, 13; South Eastern and Dover, 21; Ditto, No. 4, 9¾; York, Newcastle, and Berwick, Original, 39¾; Ditto, ditto, No. 3, 12; Ditto, Great Northern and Eastern, Preference, 9¼; York and North Midland, Preference, 14; Ditto, East and West Riding Extension, 2¾. Dutch Rhenish, 9¾; Northern of France, 11¾; Orleans and Bordeaux, 2¾; Paris and Lyons, 6.

SATURDAY MORNING. The English Market was heavy yesterday, Consols declining to 85 to ⅞, for the Opening. Absence of business appeared to be the principal cause of the depression. The Foreign and Share Markets partook of the dulness that prevailed.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—A full average quantity of Eng. sh wheat was fresh up for sale this morning, having arrived in the week, coastwise, the stands to-day were fairly supplied with samples thereof, however, the finer parcels of fine dry qualities were scarce and ready sale, and Monday's advanced rates were well supported. The middling and inferior kinds were a slow sale, but not cheaper. The imports of foreign wheat have been again small. The best qualities were quite as dear, but other sorts were unchanged. Fine malting barley the supply of which was small—sold at very full prices—common and middling sorts were held at late rates. The demand for malt kinds of malt was steady, at late quotations. Beans and peas were heavy, but Indian corn and meal were inquired for. Fine showed a full average demand.

ARRIVALS.—English, wheat, 5270; barley 7910, oats 640 quarters. Irish: wheat, —; barley, —; oats, 2360. Foreign: wheat, 8665; barley, 4450 oats, 1450 meal, —.

BANK OF ENGLAND.—Bullion in the Bank of England on the 15th December, 1847, was as follows:—

Gold in coin and bullion	£16,000,000
Silver bullion	3,000,000
Total	£19,000,000

The Rest is £3,000,000.

THE LATE MR. R. LISTON.

truly say that he contemplated any in the light of a partisan Mr. O'Connell always regarded him as the most constitutional Judge on the Bench. Mr. Justice Burton married, in 1747, Miss Anna Andrews, and by her, who died 10th March, 1823, he had an only daughter, Eliza Fellcia, who married, in 1819, John Betty West, Esq., Q.C., and M.P. for the city of Dublin.

ROBERT LISTON, ESQ.

This pre-eminently distinguished surgeon was son of a clergyman of the Church of Scotland, in whose parish he was born, in the year 1794. Mr. Liston pursued his early studies at the High School of Edinburgh, and received his professional instruction from Dr. John Barclay, a celebrated Lecturer on Anatomy in that city On completing his education, he entered on practice in the Scottish metropolis with distinguished success; but, in the year 1834, was induced, by the offer of an appointment in the North London Hospital, to remove to the capital, where he ever since maintained an eminent position in the branch of the profession to which he especially devoted himself.

Though exceedingly robust in his habits and appearance, Mr. Liston was prematurely cut off in his fifty-third year, in consequence, we believe, of having unduly exerted himself in some violent calisthenic exercises, in which he was accustomed to indulge. He was the author of several works on surgery.

He married, in 1820, a daughter of the late Adam Crawford, Esq., wine-merchant, of Leith, by whom he has left, in addition, we believe, to a son, a daughter, the wife of Mr. Dalrymple, an eminent surgeon, of Norwich.

From the post mortem examination of the body of this celebrated surgeon, it appears that the cause of death was an aneurism of the aorta, as large as an orange, pressing on and running into the trachea. The first alarming symptom occurred while Mr. Liston was receiving patients; and when perfectly quiet, he suddenly felt his mouth filled with fluid, and retiring into his dressing-room, he coughed up between thirty and forty ounces of arterial blood. Drs. Watson and Forbes attended and examined the chest, but without detecting anything morbid either in the lungs or circulation; and the deceased was himself the first to suggest the formation of an aneurism: but, in the absence of physical signs of such a lesion, a favourable view was taken of the case. The remains of the lamented gentleman were interred on Monday last in the Highgate Cemetery.

THOMAS DUNCOMBE, ESQ., OF COPGROVE, CO. YORK.

Mr. Duncombe died at his seat, near Knaresborough, on the 7th inst. He was younger brother of Charles First Lord Feversham, and great grandson of Thomas Brown, Esq., of the city of London, who inherited the great fortune of his brother-in-law, Sir Charles Duncombe, Lord Mayor of London in 1708, and assumed the surname of Duncombe. Mr. Duncombe, of Copgrove, married, in 1795, Emma, eldest daughter of the late Dr. John Hinchliffe, Bishop of Peterborough, and, by her, who died in 1840, has left four sons and three daughters, the eldest of the former being Mr. Thomas Slingsby Duncombe, M.P. for Finsbury.

LADY GARDINER.

The Right Hon. Frances Margaret, Baroness Gardiner, died at Kinmel Park, near St. Asaph, on the 8th instant, in the 34th year of her age.

Her Ladyship was fourth daughter of Lord Dinorben, and wife of the present Lord Gardiner, to whom she was married in December, 1834, and by whom she had no issue.

LADY MONTFORT.

The Right Hon. Elizabeth Lady Montfort, died at her residence, Lower Eaton-street, on the 10th inst.

Her Ladyship's maiden name was Watts, and her marriage took place on the 5th of September, 1793; she has died without issue.

THE RAJAH OF SATTARA.

The case of Puratuh Singh, the Rajah of Sattara, which has, for so many years, furnished a weapon of attack against the Board of Control, Sir J. Hobhouse, and he East India Company, and the disputes arising out of it, have just been closed by the hand of death. The Rajah departed this life on the 16th of October, at Benares, where he had for some years resided as a state prisoner, but in the enjoyment of wealth, if not of rank; for though the Indian Government deprived him of his throne, they left him in possession of a handsome revenue This circumstance may, perhaps, explain the pertinacity with which his case has been kept before the public for so many years. The meetings, resolutions, petitions, motions in the House, could not have been carried on without the mainspring of the Rajah's cash. Had he been the subject of a native power, when he fell under suspicion, it would certainly have cut off his head. The East India Company might have silenced him quite as effectually by cutting off—his pension. But the £10,000 a year it allowed the fallen Prince furnished him with arms, which have been not unskilfully used against itself.

That the East India Company dealt somewhat sternly with him, and acted on suspicions as if they were certainties, is probable enough. But in the East, our Government is perpetually put on the defensive; it must suppress the very semblance of conspiracy; the strong hand is the one thing needful, and what we understand as "fair trials," would, as between us and the native Princes, be our ruin. There are many offences highly dangerous to our supremacy in India that must be met on the instant; delay, doubt, legal formalities would be attributed by the Asiatics not to a love of justice, but weakness. And there are some cases out of the pale of law; they are questions of policy and action. The Colonial Office, for instance, does not scruple to recall by a dispatch a weak, or blundering Governor; in the same manner the Indian Government is obliged to deal with the native Princes subjected to it; in neither case can all the reasons for the step always be given. One of these doubtful cases was that of the Rajah of Sattara. His principality was created out of the ruins of the immense Mahratta Empire. The last Peishwa (or Chief) of the Mahrattas, Bajee Rou, was deposed for his treachery to us in rising in the rear of our army in the Pindaree War. Mr. Elphinstone, who had the management of a series of transactions which would require a volume to explain, "conceived that the apparent extinction of Mahratta nationality consequent on the Peishwa's removal, together with the loss of all employments under a native Government, might lead to serious troubles." Some semblance of a native power was, therefore, to be preserved, and it was resolved to put over a portion of the Peishwa's territory a Rajah. Mr. Elphinstone's instructions left him the option of giving the Prince a "Jaghire," that is a rent-charge on a portion of land, or a small sovereignty. The latter course was chosen, and this was the origin of the Rajah of Sattara. He was created by the charity of an English Commissioner, "the northern districts of the old territory becoming our province of Candeish, the western that of the Concan, the southern that of the 'South Mahratta country,' and a certain district round the old seat of Sattara being constructed by the skilful hands of Mr. Elphinstone into a pretty principality for the new Rajah; while, of the mighty Peishwa of the Mahrattas, there survived nothing but his Highness' state saddle of crimson and gold, which may be seen any day in Leadenhall-street."

Under the stipulations of this treaty, the country forming the Sattara dominions was to remain under the management of British officers, to be gradually transferred to the Rajah's management, who was bound to conform generally to the advice of the British Residents. The British Government charged itself with the defence of his territory, and the Rajah's military force was entirely regulated by the will of the East India Company. One of the fundamental conditions of the agreement, on the part of the Rajah, was the renunciation of all intercourse, with foreign Powers. A departure from this course formed the grounds upon which the Rajah was deposed by the Indian Government, about eight years since, when he was removed to Benares as a state prisoner, and remained there until the time of his death.

The charges against him were conspiracy with the authorities of Goa, and tampering with the fidelity of the native troops. The investigations were endless; but they never took the form of an open trial. His advocate maintain that all the proofs against him were fabricated, that he was the victim of a plot got up to please the Bombay Government. Certain it is that many very eminent men believed him innocent; but in a Government like that of India, it is almost impossible to retrace a step once taken. The Rajah might have been guiltless, and yet it might have been dangerous for the Government to acknowledge it. On the whole, the following summary places the question in a position that can be understood if not approved. "A creature entirely of our own construction was placed, in pursuance of our own views, on a subordinate throne, to which he had not the smallest claim, but where his demeanour was of extreme importance. He represented, in some sort, the ancient head of the Mahratta nation, and thus possessed an influence greater than that of far more formidable Powers. The Government of India were imperatively bound to exercise the keenest surveillance over the actions of a Prince whose folly might plunge into war the whole dominions intrusted to their care. The Rajah of Sattara was not like the Rajah of Kolaba or the Rajah of Cochin, who might perhaps have been harmlessly indulged in some of those intrigues without which no Asiatic can exist. He was bound to be as much beyond suspicion as beyond crime, and if it was for the interest of those who made him that he should receive a gratuitous pension of one lac of rupees in the north-east, instead of ten in the south-west, his complaints could surely not have taken that particular form which has been given them. That he was innocent of any very serious crime may possibly have been true; but it is equally true that he was visited with no very serious punishment. His worst face at our hands was better than his best fare at any others. At a period when the influence of the Peishwah was most critically jeopardised, he did undeniably conduct himself in such a manner, to say the least, as gave reasonable grounds for alarm; and he was removed from a position where he had the opportunities of infinite mischief to one where little was denied him but the power which he was apparently abusing. Misconceived and misjudged, the Rajah may possibly have been; but to speak of 'dethroning an independant Prince,' or 'oppressing an ancient ally,' is to give a colouring to his fate which it could never have borne, even if every allegation of his agents had been found to be true."

The late Rajah has left no children, and his brother now enjoys the sovereignty of Sattara without any rival to dispute his title. He, too, is childless, and his dominions are likely to lapse in a short time once more into the dominions of the Hon. Company.

SIR CHARLES DALBIAC.

THIS eminent officer was the eldest son of the late Charles Dalbiac, Esq., of Hungerford Park, Berkshire. He was born in 1775, and entered the army as a Cornet of the Fourth Dragoons, in 1793. Passing through the various grades of the British service, he became a Lieutenant-General in June, 1838. He acted with the only regiment in which he ever held a commission during the campaign of 1809, and was at the battle of Talavera. He and his dragoons were also among the most renowned at Los Santos, Llerena, and Salamanca; his regiment, for its gallantry, bears "Salamanca" on its standards. From 1822 to 1824, General Dalbiac held the command of the northern district of Gonjerut, in Bombay. In 1831 he was knighted, and the same year he presided at the Court Martial held at Bristol after the riots. Sir Charles represented Ripon in Parliament from 1835 to 1837. He had married in 1805 Miss Dalton, the eldest daughter of John Dalton, Esq., of Sleningford Hall, Yorkshire, by whom he had an only child, Susanna Stephania, married the 29th December, 1835, to the present Duke of Roxburghe. Sir Charles died on the 8th instant, at his chambers in the Albany.

SOYER'S MINIATURE KITCHEN.

THIS commodious and compact Kitchen has been fitted up on board the Guadalquiver steam-vessel (which lately left Liverpool for the Spanish Main), by Messrs. Bramah Prestage, 124, Piccadilly, under the superintendance of M. Soyer, of the Reform Club. Like all similar contrivances by M. Soyer, the present one combines great economy of space with the most methodical arrangement; since it affords every possible convenience for cooking large dinners if required, and without confusion, in the small space of eight feet by seventeen long.

The accompanying Illustration shows the interior; the figures aiding the understanding of the plan.

SOYER'S MINIATURE KITCHEN.

1.—On the left hand side of the wood-cut is the roasting fireplace, with vertical bars, smoke-jack, dripping-pan, and spits; there is, also, a small screen, with sliding doors and open shelves of iron, which is not shown in the Cut.

2.—Shows a Bainmarie-pan, for keeping sauces and soups quite hot, in boiling water; this is heated by steam introduced in the double copper pan, in which eight Bainmarie saucepans are fastened in a plate of copper, with holes the size of the several pans, which also prevent the water from upsetting by the motion of the boat: taps, for letting the steam out, and for hot and cold water, are fixed in several parts of the apparatus.

3.—Two charcoal stoves, around which is white tiling, giving it a very clean appearance.

4.—Is also a charcoal stove, showing a moveable balance grating to be used for each stove, in case of rough weather, to keep the saucepan always on the level, notwithstanding the ship's motion.

5.—Charcoal stove drawers and ventilators, also to receive hot ashes.

6.—The hot plate and gridiron, which may, by a simple contrivance, be removed at any distance from the coal fire, by having two pins at the end of it, which go into holes made through the uprights fixed into the hot plate.

7.—The oven and hot closet above, where bread, all kinds of pastry, meat, poultry, and game can be baked; these latter are, however, preferable when roasted.

8.—The pounding pestle and mortar.

9.—The Kitchen table, with sliding shelves, to pass soups and sauces; with store closets underneath.

10.—Small cupboard under the mortar, for sugar, and other condiments.

11.—Block-tin spoon dredger.

12.—Shelves for saucepans, which are kept in their places by fixed blocks of wood to the shelves for each.

Near No. 12. are two steamer pans; one with four divisions inside for potatoes, and other vegetables; the next is flatter, for meat and puddings—even fish, provided it is well cleaned after using; above, is a screen reflector, to avoid the heat from the fire of the gridiron. The black lines between the small pillars represent bands of india-rubber to prevent the rattling of the covers.

13.—Boxes for vegetables.

14.—Door leading to the deck, by the side of which are several rows of hooks, covered over, to hang up meat, game, and poultry.

Every block and stewpan is numbered, so that they are always in their proper places; all the ironwork is kept bright, by rubbing a little fat once a-week. The Kitchen is well ventilated, and fire-proof. Similar apparatus could be applied to any large vessel; and a nobleman's yacht, if fitted up like the above, would be a luxury; for it often happens that kitchen room is too confined for the sake of the chief cabin. For vessels of less importance, many things might be omitted to reduce the expense.

With the above Kitchen, if there were few persons on board, the whole of the cooking may be done with one charcoal stove, and the joints baked in the oven. The grate is also made to be reduced in width if required.

A very elegant dinner for one hundred persons may easily be prepared in this Kitchen. The apparatus may also be applied to any middling-sized house or cottage.

MOVEABLE BALANCE GRATING.

THE PROFESSOR'S LADY.

BY BERTHOLD AUERBACH.

AUTHOR OF "VILLAGE TALES OF THE BLACK FOREST."

AFTER Reinhard had read the letter which informed him of his appointment by the Prince to an official post, he announced that he must set off to the city early in the morning, but that he should soon return. Lorle slept not a wink through the whole night; she imagined all sorts of things about his sudden journey. Reinhard might have pacified her mind by a single word, if he would, but he never thought of it.

It was now as still and quiet in the Linden Tree as it used to be formerly. Though Reinhard had latterly played much fewer of his mad pranks than formerly, yet still he made noise enough in the house. Everything now fell into its old course, and hardly anybody thought of him who was gone. How rapidly does the stream of life close behind a person who steps out of his circle! Lorle alone cherished fondly the remembrance of Reinhard day and night. If she had formerly been constantly affectionate and kind towards her parents, and every one in the family, she was now doubly so; she wished always to do everything, and to wait upon every one. Nobody knew why she did so, nor did any one trouble themselves much about it; Lorle, however, did this as an atonement from the innermost of her heart, because she had severed herself from her own family, and soon would leave them altogether; now, therefore, while it was in her power, she wished to do them all the kindness that she could.

Reinhard, in the city, accepted his appointment with all possible zeal, and when the Sub-Librarian expressed his astonishment at this, he replied,

"I will confess to you that I am betrothed to Lorle."

"Indeed?" exclaimed the Sub-Librarian slowly; astonishment and sorrow were expressed on his countenance. "If she had married either of us, and had allowed herself to be lifted out of her own sphere, it ought to have been me; me only. Yes, you may laugh, but I am the one who understands her; you are far too wild; you ought, properly, not to marry. Has her father then given his consent?"

"No."

"O, then there is still a hope left that she will have neither of us," said the Sub-Librarian.

Reinhard did not leave the place until he had received the certificate of his nomination. The morning after this was signed and sealed, he said to himself on his awaking, "Good morning, Mr. Inspector with the title of Professor: have you slept well? Have you then let them put a collar about your neck, too, you that were so well off when you were running about just at your own pleasure?" When he stood before the glass, he made a low bow, and said very politely—"Your servant, Mr. Professor; your most obedient servant."

After this he delighted himself with the thought of how altered things were with him now, when he should appear again before the Landlord of the Linden Tree to woo his daughter, and how happy this would make her.

He soon packed up his lay figure and some old silks that he had bought for the painting of his draperies, and rolled back to the village where his love dwelt.

CHAPTER V.

ONLY BE QUIET.

DURING this journey, a thought occurred which made Reinhard's cheeks burn with an unusual glow. He had just left the circles of what might be called "carpeted existence;" he had immediately become aware of a something peculiarly agreeable in this refined world; in the charm diffused by the play of lively spirits; in the sentimental music, and the sparkling corruscations of wit; and all this far removed from the rude reality belonging to the narrow business of common tradesman life. He had hitherto hastily combated against the longing for these pleasures; it came now again in another shape, and showed to him that Lorle never would be able to understand this freedom of life, and that she would ever stand far removed from the whole of his artistical mode of thought; he should be in his own house a stranger—with all his best wishes a stranger.

That was a drop of bad blood in Reinhard, and it made his cheeks crimson.

He soon abandoned the idea of educating Lorle by degrees to this mode of life, and he exclaimed, almost aloud, "No; she shall continue the fresh child of nature, amid the frippery of the city; she requires no other world; I am the whole world to her. He begged her pardon because his thoughts had only for one moment removed her from herself.

Those long intervals which have to be passed through between one critical point of life and another have both their good and their evil to an excitable temperament; they often curb the intoxicating bliss of the feeling, and they step in as peace-makers in easily-aroused dissensions.

Reinhard drove on as carelessly as if this were not the most decided path of life; even his longings were clear and peaceful. He set his luggage at the neighbouring town, and hastened along the path through the wood to the village. As he approached the place, the vehement fire of love began again to flame up within him: with a violently beating heart he rushed to the house. Barbel stood at the door, and offered him her hard hand.

"You are soon come back again," said she; "I did not expect it."

Reinhard could not make any reply: he wished to speak his first word to Lorle: he hastened up the steps, but nobody was at home. Lorle was, as Barbel related, gone with her parents to the neighbouring town, from which Reinhard had just come.

It was a difficult task to have to wait for hours with the news of his good fortune on his lips.

Without waiting long, Reinhard again set out to meet them on their way home; but after he had walked for an hour along the road through the wood, it occurred to him that while he was walking along there as full of thought the little carriage in which they were gone might have returned with them on the high-road along the valley; he, therefore, quietly turned round and walked back again, but he found them not yet arrived. An inexpressible anguish tormented him as he thought that perhaps Lorle had already departed from him; her parents had taken her to the city, and he could not but confess that he had deserved this on account of his doubt; on the other hand his confidence in Lorle's fidelity to him assured him, and, as he went along right, it seemed to him as if the picture upon the easel beamed out of the canvas; he brought in lights and now again contemplated the picture after a period of absence. He was astonished at what he had done; he had here succeeded in representing what another, a mightier than himself, had created.

Reinhard took his guitar and began to play and sing, but he soon left off again; at length he lay down upon his bed: drest as he was; he wished that very night to speak to his beloved and not to lose a single hour of happiness. He, however, fell asleep; the family returned late in the night.

The mother went to bed; the father sat in his little inner parlour to read the newspapers which he had brought with him, and Lorle, spite of all warnings, kept finding something or other to do. At length she came timidly up to her father in the little inner-room and said, "Father, I have a favour to ask."

"Be quiet; what do you want?"

Lorle laid her hand on the shoulder of her father and whispered into his ear with a trembling voice, "Mr. Reinhard loves me and I love him, and he wishes to have me, and I wish to have him and nobody else in the whole world."

"Indeed? and that you two have been planning between yourselves, ?" said the Host

"Yes."

"Be quiet; now do you go to bed; there will be time enough to-morrow to talk about this."

No begging and beseeching of Lorle's availed anything; she could get no other answer.

When the Landlord of the Linden Tree, according to his usual custom, took a survey of the whole house, he found Reinhard's chamber door half open; the slat is quietly and turned the key the look on the inside; Reinhard was locked in.

In the morning Lorle was awakened early by her father, and when she came down he said, "Do you go immediately to the Valley Mill and stop there till I come."

Lorle was obliged to obey; she knew very well that there was no use in expostulation; she darted not go up stairs again, and immediately got ready to set out.

The Landlord walked down, and quarrelled with Stephan and all of them, because they none of them had such a sleepless night as himself. At length, he sent Stephan to the little inner room, and read the press of corn in the sale himself down in the little inner room, and read the press of corn in various papers; yet, spite of the high prices, his lips were compressed, and he drummed with his feet in anger on the floor.

They heard now upstairs a violent knocking, and that reminded the Host that he had locked Reinhard in; he commanded Barbel to release him, and thus he was spared the speaking out his mind to the Painter at once. Reinhard came up to the Landlord, extending both his arms; the old man, however, stepped back and, and, holding his paper with both his hands, looked over it, and said—

"So, you are here again, are you?"

"And I hope at home," returned Reinhard.

"So quiet? What! have to say to you is this, pack up your things, and be off with you, in heaven's name."

"And Lorle?" asked Reinhard, asted.

"I shall soon bring her to rights," replied the Host; "that is my business; nobody has anything to do with that."

"I shall not leave the house," said Reinhard, "until Lorle herself has told me that I must go."

"Indeed! That is the way you gentlemen out of the city do, is it? I can set things to rights. Do you understand?" said the Host, rising in

"I do not expect that degree of passion and pride from you," remarked Reinhard.

The old man breathed with angry vehemence, clenched both his fists, and silently surveyed Reinhard from top to toe, as if he would have said "Who would have thought it? Am I the man with whom people talk in this way?"

Reinhard also arose, and said, at length, "You used to be a sensible man; why are you now so angry, what harm have I done?"

These calm words did not fail of producing their effect, and the Landlord said, in a tremulous voice, "Indeed! am I to steal away my child, my only daughter?"

"Lorle shall speak. Where is she?" asked Reinhard.

"Lorle is not here as long as you are here," said the Landlord After a little while, however, when he had noticed the deep distress which was expressed on Reinhard's countenance, he continued—

"But I can tell you where the girl is; she is at the Valley Mill."

"I promise you," said Reinhard quickly, "not to speak one word to her without your knowledge."

"I believe that you have hitherto acted as an honest man: and now I must go to the end," said he more composedly.

In the evening, Reinhard related to the father how he merely had got a situation out of love to Lorle, and how he would make her eternally happy. The old man was silent, and looked attentively at Reinhard over the glass, which he was just about to put to his lips.

The old man went always grumbling about the house; and he even had, which otherwise never happened, little quarrels with his wife. He would have been very glad if she would recollect, or have taken upon him with beggings and prayings, that he might have come to a clear understanding about the matter. But she made, as they say, "no bother about it;" she would not be made responsible for the thing hereafter, and besides this she was now too much cut up with the thought of her child going so far away from her among quite new connections; she was so weary with anxiety and thinking that she sate herself down to rest, now here now there, wherever she could find a seat.

On the third day the Landlord went to Reinhard in his room, seated himself, and for a long time was silent: at length he began:—"I have made up my mind. It is like cutting a piece out of my own heart to let my child go so far off, and yet what is to be done? I make you therefore this proposal; I will send my Lorle to the convent school for twelve months, and there she shall learn what is necessary for city life; and if you are then in the same mind as now, why, then, let it be, in God's name."

Reinhard replied, and assured the father that it was not necessary for Lorle to learn anything, and that she would make him happy just as she now was. The old man seemed, and Reinhard was

The worse for it, replied the latter. With regard to Reinhard, the making known of his engagement to Lorle caused considerable astonishment, but excited no envy. Reinhard was always a favourite, and another out of the village came to congratulate her; almost everybody had something especially to say to Reinhard's praise; and the only cause of regret was, that Lorle was going such a long way off; she made everybody promise, however, that they would come and see her, and lodge, and take a meal with her, if ever they went to the capital.

Several little peculiarities in Lorle now showed themselves. She would scarcely ever lean upon Reinhard's arm, as she went through the village; but as soon as she was out of sight of the houses, she would put her arm in his, and thing would induce her to take a walk with Reinhard in the week-days, but when Sunday evening came, then she was ready; this was according to village manners, and by this she was guided.

One subject there was which occasioned a great deal of discussion between the father and Reinhard. The young man wished to be married early in autumn, and the old man no longer remain single; he would be left by himself, he thought, in his declining years, and, in the other hand, the latter would not consent to the affair as he wished another to be, because, however, he knew that she would be unhappy, and, in the last reason, the mother gave out webs of yarn to be woven by all the weavers in the neighbourhood, and sewing to be done by all seamstresses, while the sister of the Sub-Librarian, to whom the main measure was sent, was employed to get town-made dresses in readiness for Lorle.

Lorle, during this time, would not leave undone any of her house-work or a single care; in fact, she was more industrious that ever, she wished to get everything in order, and thus to leave them; she was also an honourable servant, who before she leaves her place would, if not own free will, clean and put in perfect order the whole house from top to bottom. Reinhard was obliged to let her have her own way, and for this reason, she was always full of life and spirit for the evening walk.

It was over quaking-grass and hare-bells that Lorle shed her first tears in these days of their courtship. The lovers were walking together across a [illegible] and Reinhard was [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

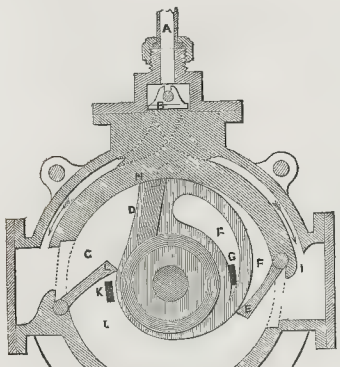
THE ST. GEORGE'S BREWERY, WHITECHAPEL.

THE ST. GEORGE'S BREWERY.

We present our readers with an Engraving of the interior of a new model building, called the St. George's Brewery, lately erected in Church-street, Whitechapel, by Messrs. John Furze and Co., after the designs of Mr. Charles Humphreys, their surveyor. There are so many points of construction in this establishment, that we have judged its sectional details worthy of representation.



INTERIOR OF ROTARY STEAM ENGINE.

On entering the building, at that part which is assigned to the brewing of the malt, we are struck with the absence of that mass of machinery which is generally employed in breweries, with its usual concomitant noise. Perfect quiet pervades the building, although every part of the process may be in full operation; and, by a judicious arrangement of signals for the Engineer to direct the power under his charge, one man regulates the whole department with ease; although every operation depends upon him, from the measuring and grinding the malt as received from the maltster, to the mashing, hopping, boiling, &c. Here, also, through the employment of proper means, the temperature of the air is not raised five degrees; although two coppers may be in full work, one or which evaporates at the rate of three hundred gallons per hour.

The cooling and fermenting departments are separated from the above by stores for malt and hops. Here the beer, in its several stages, is drawn off by the force of gravity, instead of being removed, as is usually the case, by pumping; so that, in the last stage through which it passes, the beer becomes perfectly fine, and is so drawn off into the store-vats, in the lowest part of the building.

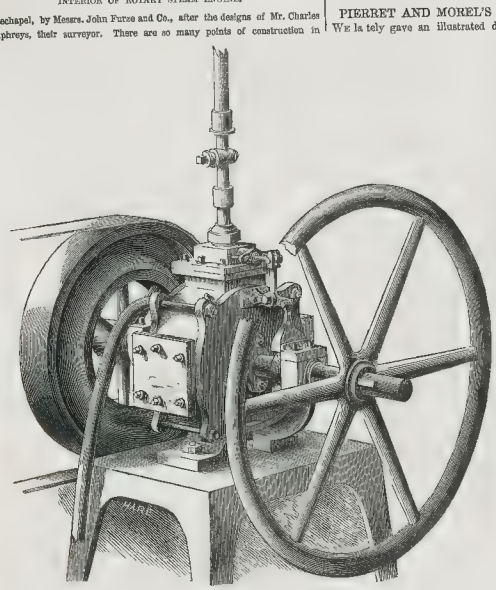
The cellar is a noble store, 120 feet long, 37 feet wide, and no less than 26 feet high, surrounded by walls 3 feet thick, and covered with a series of brick arches, forming a fire-proof floor, laid with Seyssell Asphalte for the upper part of the building. This Cellar has two rows of iron columns, each column weighing upwards of three tons, and carrying brackets for the support of the girders that bear the store-vats. Vertically on these columns are placed three series of other columns, diminishing in size, as well as sets of iron girders locking together, and bracing from wall to wall, for carrying the upper floors of the building, and the ponderous utensils and plant; the whole surmounted by a water-tank in wrought iron, containing upwards of 32,000 gallons, which forms the roof. By the constant conducting power of these columns, and other arrangements, the temperature of the store-cellar has hitherto stood fixed at 59 degrees.

The Vats are all carried upon strongly-flanged iron girders, and cross longitudinal bearers of iron resting upon the girders extend throughout the length of the building. By these means an immense surface of conducting power is brought into play, for the purpose of conveying the heat, formed by various causes, to the upper floors. Iron spiral staircases are constructed in the building, and great facilities are obtained by them at a small cost of room, while durability and ventilation are amply secured. These are the most striking points connected with the building in the abstract; the improvements in the brewing apparatus are, of course, too technical for general information.

Our Engraving shows the sunk Basement Cellar, containing the store-vats, &c.; the department in the upper floors, shown on the right, is devoted to the brewing; while the various utensils required for fermentation are figured on the left. The Malt and Hop Stores are in the centre. On the extreme right are the two Steam Boilers, separated from the main building by the Engine-House and Chimney.

PIERRET AND MOREL'S ROTARY STEAM ENGINE.

We lately gave an illustrated description of a rotary engine by a talented fellow-countryman; and, as the subject is just now exciting a good deal of interest, we have the pleasure of submitting to our readers another of the same rated power, viz: 4 horses—it is the invention of MM. Pierret and Morel of Paris.



ROTARY STEAM ENGINE.

Fig. 1, is an external view of it as seen at work; the break in the fly wheel exposes the arrangement for working the slide valve—thus, on the main axle, just inside the plumber block, is an eccentric which gives motion to the crank lever, the upper arm of which is connected with and moves the slide valve in and out at every revolution of the fly wheel.

Fig. 2 is a section of the interior. The steam enters through the pipe A, and is turned by the slide valve B, alternately into the courses right and left in the direction of the arrows; and, supposing the steam to be now admitted into the chamber C., it would act upon the arm of the piston D. and force it round in the direction of the valve E., at the same time the exhaustion is going on in the chamber FF through the aperture G.; but, when the point of the piston H. has reached the end of the valve E., that valve is closed, as shown by the dotted lines, but the instant it has passed the point of the valve E., this valve slides up the face of the piston D., and the steam being then admitted at I., renews the pressure on the surface D, at the same time the exhaustion of the chamber J is going on through the opening K, and the piston is urged on in the direction of the valve I., where the steam is again admitted. This process is repeated at either side at every revolution of the fly wheel. The waste steam passes off by the bent tubes shown in Fig. I.

NEW MUSEUM, AT IPSWICH.

A Museum has just been established in Ipswich, upon a most efficient and liberal principle, and one which we should be glad to see followed in most of the chief towns in the kingdom.

The Institution was first set on foot by Mr. George Ransome, a gentleman resident in the town, who succeeded in collecting around him a number of scientific, influential, and wealthy friends, whose united efforts, it is gratifying to find, are about to be crowned with a degree of success which, in the first instance, could hardly have been anticipated.

The principal intention of this Institution is to provide for the working and humble classes of the community a rational and instructive means of occupation, with the view of inducing them to devote a portion of their limited time to the contemplation of the diversity and beauty of the objects of Nature, and to provide for them a series of popular lectures, which will be illustrated by the specimens contained within the Museum, that they may be induced, not only to see and examine the varied objects which the Institution provides for their observation, but be led to understand their nature, and the wise intention of their diversified forms, and admirable adaptation of means to an end.

It is intended to give the working classes free admission to the Museum on certain days of the week; as well as to lectures on Natural History, and other subjects, which the specimens contained in the Museum will illustrate.

The Institution promises to be one of first-rate character; and, whilst its chief object is the instruction of the working classes of society, the intention is to render it no less attractive to the more educated portion of the community, by its scientific arrangement.

NEW MUSEUM AT IPSWICH.

The Library of the Institution, which is to be used as one of reference, has already received many valuable contributions, to which others are continually being added; and there is every probability of its being, before long, one of great utility and value.

It is also highly gratifying to be able to state that many gentlemen of the highest standing in the scientific and literary world have been pleased to connect themselves with this Institution, as will be seen by the accompanying list of officers:

PATRONS.—His Grace the Duke of Hamilton, F.R.S.; Most Noble the Marquis of Bristol, F.R.S.; Right Hon. Earl Stradbroke, Lord Lieutenant of the county of Suffolk; the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Norwich.

PRESIDENT.—Rev. William Kirby, A.M., F.L.S., &c.

VICE-PRESIDENTS.—G. B. Airy, Esq., M.A., F.R.S., Astronomer Royal; Professor Bell, F.R.S.; Sir J. P. Boileau, Bart., F.R.S.; Most Noble the Marquis of Conyngham; Professor E. Forbes, F.R.S.; Sir W. J. Hooker, K.H., LL.D., F.R.S., Rev. Professor Henslow, M.A., F.L.S., &c.; Sir W. Jardine, Bart., F.R.S., F.L., William Long, Esq.; Sir W. J. F. Middleton, Bart.; Professor Owen, F.R.S.; Right Hon. Lord Rendlesham, M.P.; Rev. Professor Sedgwick, M.A., F.R.S., &c.; R. N. Shawe, Esq.; John Tollemache, Esq., M.P., Right Hon. Lord Thurlow; T. B. Western, Esq.; Very Rev. the Dean of Westminster, F.R.S., Rev. W. Whewell, D.D., F.R.S., Master of Trinity College, Cambridge; William Yarrell, Esq., F.L.S., V.P.Z.S.

CURATOR.—Dr. Clarke.

The Institution was opened on Wednesday, in due form; the attendance of patrons was very considerable, and the company were addressed by the Bishop of Norwich, the Dean of Westminster, Professor Henslowe, Sir J. F. Boileau, the Rev. W. Kirby (the President); Mr. Yarrell, &c.

The façade of the New Museum is a handsome design by Mr. Fleury, architect, Ipswich: it has a noble portico, and is enriched with a fluted column at the angles, and is crowned with a neat balustrade; the whole neatly executed in stone.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

"THE REVOLUTION HOUSE."

This "relic of the Revolution" is situated at Whittington, near Chesterfield and Dronfield, in Derbyshire; and is celebrated as the place where, in 1688, certain noblemen met to concert measures for overthrowing the Popish Government of James II., and securing the Protestant Establishment by the influence of the Prince of Orange. The persons who met here were the Duke of Devonshire, the Earl of Danby, and a Mr. John D'Arcy; and here they planned those measures which broke out into overt acts at Nottingham. At the time, the cottage was a public-house, called the Cock and Pynot: it is now known as the Cock and Magpie.

"THE REVOLUTION HOUSE," AT WHITTINGTON.

A room to the right of the doorway is pointed out as the Plotting Parlour; and the chair in which the Duke of Devonshire sat has been preserved as a memorial.

The property was sold, a short time since: the sum obtained was £73s: the purchaser was a stonemason, named Woodhouse, who has, also, long been the landlord of the Cock and Magpie.

In 1788, the centennarial day was kept up with great pomp. The then Duke of Devonshire, his two brothers, the heads of the Osborne or Duke of Leeds family in behalf of their ancestor, the Earl of Danby, and the Earl of Stamford as representative of the D'Arcys, attended by many hundred gentlemen in carriages and on horseback, and by many thousands of the populace, after hearing a sermon by Dr. Pegge, at Whittington Church, and visiting the Revolution Parlour, proceeded in grand procession to Chesterfield, where they passed the remainder of the day in patriotic festivity.

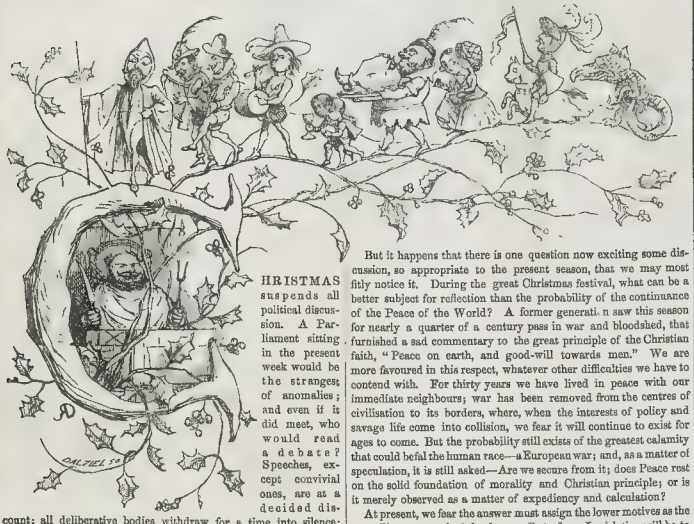
THE PROSPECTS OF PEACE.



CHRISTMAS suspends all political discussion. A Parliament sitting in the present week would be the strangest of anomalies; and even if it did meet, who would read a debate? Speeches, except convivial ones, are at a decided discount; all deliberative bodies withdraw for a time into silence; even parish vestries are mollified, and forget their small controversies. The usual materials for comment disappear.

But it happens that there is one question now exciting some discussion, so appropriate to the present season, that we may most fitly notice it. During the great Christmas festival, what can be a better subject for reflection than the probability of the continuance of the Peace of the World? A former generation saw this season for nearly a quarter of a century pass in war and bloodshed, that furnished a sad commentary to the great principle of the Christian faith, "Peace on earth, and good-will towards men." We are more favoured in this respect, whatever other difficulties we have to contend with. For thirty years we have lived in peace with our immediate neighbours; war has been removed from the centres of civilisation to its borders, where, when the interests of policy and savage life come into collision, we fear it will continue to exist for ages to come. But the probability still exists of the greatest calamity that could befal the human race—a European war; and, as a matter of speculation, it is still asked—Are we secure from it; does Peace rest on the solid foundation of morality and Christian principle; or is it merely observed as a matter of expediency and calculation?

At present, we fear the answer must assign the lower motives as the prevailing ones. And the future effect of our Legislation will be to encourage the sense of expediency. If Free Trade should ever expand into universal commerce, it is certain the world will see what it has rarely seen yet—a universal peace. Men cannot trade and fight at the same time; though the last war proved that hostilities and a contraband commerce may, under some circumstances, exist together. It is safer, in the worldly sense, to rely on what appeals to men's interests than their reason; and, as the passion for gain is one of the strongest of human motives, it may be the best antagonist to those other bad passions which have plunged the world in war, and caused such frightful miseries. It is possible, therefore, that, in some future ages, when people have made themselves necessary to each other, they will cease to cut each others' throats. Had America sold us no cotton, the Oregon Boundary, dispute would probably have produced a war. But, interest is a great peace-maker: causes of quarrel may arise in abundance; but it becomes a question whether it is prudent to pursue them to the last resort.

> For the jingling of the guinea helps the hurt that honour feels,
> And the nations do but murmur, snarling at each other's heels.

It is very undignified, perhaps, but, if they can exist better in grumbling than in fighting, it is something gained, and the "jingling of the guinea" has its use. It is a pity that so pure a principle as that of the love of peace should be most effectually preached by the more sordid and material instrument; yet Peace is a blessing from whatever motive maintained; it leaves a breathing time, at least, for other and better feelings to grow up, and may, in the end, make them the superior ones. We must accept it from the lower and less worthy influence before we can have it from the higher.

But the Peace so purchased is but an imperfect blessing, since it leaves nations in that state in which war is always a possibility. Mutual suspicions and jealousies, intentions and purposes ill understood, keep the world armed and on the defensive; it is not a perfect Peace so much as an imperfect war. We have everything that a state of war requires, except actual fighting; we keep the tools of destruction always ready, with the hope we shall have no occasion for them. Millions are sunk, with a prayer that the expenditure may be useless. Each country deals with its means of defence like Mercutio with his sword, who was used to lay it on the table with a "Heaven send me no need of thee;" and too often the knowledge that the deadly instrument is close at hand, causes it to be drawn "when in truth there is no need." A boundary dispute, or a Royal marriage, are to nations just what "the operation of the third cup" was to the hasty Montague. It is of small moment what intoxicates men or nations, if, in their anger, they come to blows.

On two separate occasions within the last week or two the great champion of Free Trade has strongly pointed out its moral and pacific influence as the greatest of its results, superior in importance to its material effects. Perhaps he sees farther, or is more sanguine than most men; but on this point it seems to us his opinions are a little in extreme. He wishes at once to anticipate the better time, and place England one step at least nearer the Golden Age. He wishes to reduce our Army and Navy Estimates very considerably. By a misrepresentation he has been made to say the country could save the whole expenditure; and the statement has occasioned no slight surprise. He does not go so far; but he does contend that it is absurd for two countries like France and England to be perpetually forcing each other into a lavish expenditure of the national wealth, by useless additions to their fleets and armies, and fortifications. This is the feeling the existence of which is beginning to be denounced as unworthy of reasoning men. The £17,000,000 we spend on our Army and Navy is called a "horrible item." If war is to be henceforth impossible, it is not only horrible, it is foolish. If it can be proved that any portion of it is needless, we do not know any pleasanter anticipation for a Christmas week than the chance of saving some two or three millions; it is something to have even the chance of it held out to us; "the wish hath a preferment in it," though of its being realised we have more hope than expectation.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The Journal des Débats gives the following sketch of the proceedings to be adopted by the members of the Chamber of Deputies previous and subsequent to the opening of the Chambers, on the 28th inst.:—

"On the 27th inst., a preparatory sitting will be held by the members of the Chamber of Deputies, with closed doors, to select their officers. M. Sapey will, most probably, be the President, in consequence of being the oldest member. The four youngest members, MM. de Morode, de la Guiche, Oscar de Lafayette, and Cahuzac, junior, will be appointed Secretaries. On the 29th, the day subsequent to the Royal sitting, the Deputies, after having balloted for committeemen, will proceed, in their respective commissions, to examine the qualifications of the new deputies elected or re-elected since the last session. The Conservative party appears more than ever determined to vote for M. Sauzet, who, at the last election, obtained 223 votes out of 339. The Conservatives mean, further, to propose MM. Bignon, Lepelletier d'Aulnay, F. Delessert, and Marshal Bugeaud, as Vice Presidents. The Conservative candidates for the functions of secretary are MM. de Bussières, Oger, Saglio, and Lanjuinais. These preparatory elections will probably occupy the 29th, 30th, and 31st instant, and the Committee on the Address cannot be appointed before Monday, the 3d of January. There are thirteen Parliamentary bills and four resolutions lying over since the last session. It is announced that the Ministers propose to present to the Chamber at the opening of the Session three bills—one reducing the tax on salt, the second for postal reform, and the third, granting a pension of 150,000 francs (£6000) to Jerome Bonaparte, ex-King of Westphalia, who has obtained permission to reside in France."

Lord Normanby, the British Ambassador, returned to Paris on Saturday, and had a long interview with the King, at the palace of St. Cloud, on Sunday.

M. Guizot's plan for the direction of the ensuing parliamentary campaign is said to be in substance as follows:—The Minister means to propose a partial modification of the electoral law of the year 1831, and to extend the franchise. He further proposes to introduce a bill to establish a reduced and uniform rate of postage; and another, to reduce the present tax on salt. With respect to the foreign affairs of the country, M. Guizot is prepared to show that his policy has been triumphant in Germany, Italy, Spain, Greece, throughout the East, and even in Switzerland!!!

The great affair of the day is the Presidency of the Chamber, and the Cabinet has caused it to be officially announced that it will retire if M. Sauzet be not nominated

The result of the demand of interdiction made by Countess Mortier, has been a decision of the Court, ordering proofs to be given, with all speed, of the acts committed by Count Mortier, when in a state of intoxication on divers occasions already publicly stated; and, for that purpose, an investigation has been ordered, to be commenced within the fortnight after the judgment was delivered; the Doctors Pabret, Lauret, and Foville, are to visit Count Mortier; and within a fortnight from the day on which the judgment was given, they shall give in a final report on the question of Mortier's being able, with safety, to be removed to an establishment not devoted to madmen.

According to the returns of the produce and consumption of domestic sugar in France since the commencement of the season, the number of manufacturers on the 1st inst. was 303, or 10 more than at the corresponding period of 1846; the quantity of sugar manufactured, and lying over since last year, amounted to 23,064,747 kilogrammes; that sold for consumption, to 8,363,847; and the duties levied thereon during the year, to 14,696,469f.

At the general meeting of the refugee Poles, on the 25th ult., at the Salle Valentino, M. Bakounine, Nan lan refugee, made a speech against the Emperor of Russia. M. Guizot, in consequence, caused to be given to M. Bakounine, by the Prefect of Police, an order to quit Paris in twenty-four hours, and France without the least delay. M. Bakounine, having inquired the Prefecture of Police the cause of his expulsion, was told that the Ministerial decree merely stated that his presence was calculated to compromise public order and tranquillity, without mentioning any fact to justify the measure. M. Bakounine vainly addressed to the Minister himself a similar demand; he was obliged to quit Paris and France without having obtained a reply.

SPAIN.

No very salient point has recently presented itself to especial observation in the confused mass of intrigue, violence, and bad faith, which make up the sum of Spanish politics, and, in the consequent absence of that attention which was called off to the more stirring events in other parts of Europe, "the affairs of Spain," within the last few weeks, have been treated rather concisely in our "brief chronicle" of Foreign Intelligence—we therefore give a resume of what our lively neighbours call "the situation" of political matters at Madrid.

The debate on the Address in the Chamber of Deputies lasted ten days—an unusual, if not an unprecedented, time in Spain. The important incident in it was the repeated declaration of Narvaez as to the constitutional and conciliatory spirit in which he declared himself to be resolved to carry on the Government. He illustrated these principles by a minute account of what had passed with reference to the return of Espartero to his native country, and he protested that not only was there no obstacle to his return, but that he himself and his former rival, would be the first to take the exile by the hand, and reinstate him among the senators of the kingdom. This language produced intense irritation among the French faction in the Moderado party, and in the secret councils of Christina, Mon and Pidal spoke with great bitterness; and Christina herself, thinking to carry matters with a high hand, proceeded at once to the closet of her daughter, and demanded the dismissal of Narvaez from his post at the head of the Cabinet. Queen Isabella, however, happily preserved enough of clear-sightedness and resolution to resist the demands of her insatiable parent, and she refused to part with a Minister whose language, speaking of Espartero, was so correct in the fulfilment of her own gracious intentions towards that individual. Thus, on the one hand, Narvaez has pledged himself to a course which entitles him to the support of the national party, as long as he adheres to it; and, on the other, he has incurred the direct hostility of Christina and the French agents

This schism has since been widened by an important incident which occurred a few days later. No sooner had the debate on the Address commenced in the Senate, (where it takes place after the debate in the Lower Chamber), than Senor Olozaga, a man respected by all parties, the head of the last ephemeral Administration, rose from his seat, and having described the earnest solicitations by which the Queen had prevailed on him to accept the burdens of office with a view to rescue her from the dangers and embarrassments of her position, he adverted, amidst the breathless curiosity of the august assembly, to the unparalleled intrigues by which the last Ministerial revolution was accomplished, and the influence of France once more installed in the heart of the Spanish Court. He recapitulated some of those details which became known to the world at the time through the press, and which he, the then Prime Minister of Spain, could best of all judge were calculated to excite misery and horror on the Queen, the treachery of those in whom she most confided, the unrelenting spirit of her oppressors. Then pulling a sealed packet of papers from his bosom, he added that those scandalous details could not now be made public in all their particulars, but that irrefragable evidence of the facts was there in his possession, and would be forthcoming at the proper time. The effect of this harangue is described to have been terrible. It laid bare the foundations of the power which has usurped the Government of Spain. It opened an abyss between that section of the Conservative majority which is sincerely devoted to the service of the Crown and that which is Conservative only in the interests of the foreign Prince, and it established the fact that the Cortes of Spain is still the safest guardian of the national honour.

This state of things renders it highly probable that Christina and the French party, at enmity with Narvaez, denounced in the Cortes, and detested by the nation, must either forfeit the position they have resumed, or consummate their enterprise by some coup d'état. The plan for bringing the Duke and Duchess of Montpensier to Madrid, upon the requisition of the Cortes, has not been persisted in, however, from some motive or other.

The Senate, terminated, on the 14th, the discussion on the Address in reply to the speech from the Throne. The eighth paragraph containing a vote of censure against the Gayoda Cabinet, was adopted by 75 votes to 6.

SWITZERLAND.

The recent political agitation has been succeeded by a calm equally still as the preceding disturbance was violent.

There is no news of the slightest interest. The Diet was expected to close on the 17th or 18th, to receive the Deputy from Neufchatel, by whom the announcement of their submission to the decree of the 11th instant, for the payment of 300,000 Swiss francs, has been brought. It is worthy of notice, that, independently of this sum, 34,000 francs have lately been subscribed in some districts of the canton of Neufchâtel for the wounded and the widows and orphans of those slain in the late war

A grand dinner was given on the 16th, by the Vorort, at Berne, to Sir Stratford Canning and Mr. Peel, at which the representatives of Belgium and Spain were present.

The sum of 5,047,100f., ordered to be paid by the Swiss Cantons of the ex-Sonderbund for the expenses of the war, is divided as follows: Lucerne, 2,132,000 : Uri, 96,760f., Schwytz, 246,830f.; Unterwalden (Obwald), 90,6.0f.; do. (Nidwald), 66,040f.; Zug, 105,50f.; Fribourg, 1,826,200f.; Valais, 787,200f.

ITALY.

There is no news of any particular interest from Italy. The spirit of reform introduced by the leading crowned heads in the Peninsular, progresses gradually but earnestly and with success.

Advices from Massa, of the 9th, state that a collision took place between the Modenese dragoons and the people, who put the former to flight with volleys of stones. The Pensionnaire Gazette of the 16th revives the rumour of the probable annexation of Massa and Carrara to Tuscany

The clergy of Siena have contributed 8000 francs towards the armament of the civic guard.

Ibrahim Pacha arrived at Lucca on the 12th inst.

The Pope has summoned to Rome Count Pietro Ferretti, in order to confide to him an important financial mission. Lord Minto had a private audience of the Pope on the 9th inst.; his Lordship was shortly expected to leave for Naples.

GERMAN STATES

The Germanic Diet held an extraordinary meeting on the 10th inst., which was convoked by the Vice-President. There were eleven members present, and six others represented. The subject of deliberation was the affairs of Switzerland, which at present very much engage the attention of both Prussia and Austria. The Diet fully approved the resolutions of the Powers towards Switzerland, and, moreover, decided that if Switzerland changed her Constitution and adopted an "Unitarian" form of Government, the Powers parties to the treaty of Vienna had a right to deprive her of the neutrality they had guaranteed to the Helvetic Confederation.

GREECE

This unhappy land, the hotbed of impulse, is said to be again the theatre of revolution.

Advices to the 13th inst. state that an insurrection had broken out; that the garrison of Patras was attacked by the people; that the governor was taken prisoner by the insurgents; and the garrison, too weak to resist the numbers of the people, had been obliged to seek shelter in the fortresses, where supplies of food could scarcely reach them. The Spitfire steamer had been sent to Patras, to render all the assistance in her power to the English residents there. Grivas was reported to be the leader of the insurgents, who had already killed and wounded several.

RUSSIA.

The Emperor, on the 26th of November (the 8th of December), issued a manifesto, announcing that the Grand Duke Constantine has attained his majority; and, by an ukase of the same date, Vice-Admiral Lieutenant-General Lutke has been appointed Curator to his Imperial Highness. The Grand Duke, in order to signalise the day of his coming of age, has assigned, for the relief of the poor, 7500 rubles out of his privy purse.

The exportation of rye and other grain from Poland has been interdicted from the 13th of January next. This decision will, it is thought, cause great injury to the corn trade in Prussia, as that country imports from Poland, for its own use alone, 1,000,000 bushels of rye per annum, besides a large quantity of wheat, which it forwards to Holland by Danzic

PRUSSIA.

Counsellor Wedseki, who has his residence in Hanover, has been arrested there at the instigation of the Prussian Government He is said to have grossly violated the confidence of a high personage.

ALGIERS.

All the letters from Oran state that Abd-el-Kader had made his submission to the Emperor of Morocco, and that the different columns of French troops stationed along the frontier had been ordered to return to their respective quarters. Some of these letters, however, describe this submission as a new act of hypocrisy by the Emir.

EGYPT.

The latest dates from Alexandria are to the 9th inst. Her Majesty's steamer frigate Sidon, Captain W. Henderson, C.B., had arrived there on the 4th, having on board the Earl and Countess of Dalhousie, who, with their suite, left for Cairo on the following day to meet the Pasha's steamer, accompanied by Artin Bey, the Prime Minister. The latter was to attend upon the noble Earl by the order of Mehemet Ali. His Excellency was to make a short stay at Cairo, to see Mehemet Ali, and proceed to Syria, where he was expected. He was to embark on the 10th, on board of the steamer Mooseffer for India. Apartments had been prepared for Lord Dalhousie in Mehemet Ali's Palace at Ras-el-tene, but he preferred staying on board the Sidon during the whole time he was in Alexandria. At Cairo, also, he was to have apartments in one of the Viceroy's palaces.

Mehemet Ali intended proceeding on a tour to the Upper Country.

Trade continued dull in Alexandria.

The preliminary surveys and levellings for the proposed canal through the Isthmus of Suez are progressing rapidly.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

The accounts of the present military operations against the Kaffirs are of a cheering nature. Sandilla has fled from the Amatola country, leaving it in undisturbed possession of the troops, who entered it in three columns. Sir George Berkeley will, however, watch him, and probably strike a finishing blow at Fato and Crelli on the Kei. Sandilla is reported to be ready to surrender unconditionally; this will produce the submission of Fato, and then, as there will only remain Crelli to deal with, the war will soon be ended.

INDIA

Despatches in anticipation of the Bombay mails of the 18th of November have been received. The intelligence is not of exciting interest.

India was tranquil. In Lahore, the Dussera festival had passed over in quiet. Sir F. Currie was named to succeed Colonel Lawrence on the departure of the latter from the Punjaub, where he had performed the duties of British Plenipotentiary. The Sikh soldiers were behaving well under the guidance of the British, and had defeated a refractory tribe in the mountainous districts near Peshawur, who refused to pay their regular tribute. The Councillors at the capital had begun to quarrel amongst themselves from jealousy of each other, and Tej Singh had expressed his fears that he would be exiled, like his predecessor, Lall Singh. Sir F. Currie knows the character of the intriguers, and would, it was expected, effectually controul them.

From Affghanistan we hear that Dost Mahomed was eager to have heavy guns, and had enticed some of the gun-founders from Peshawur to gratify his wishes. With heavy guns the passes of the mountains would, it is said, be rendered impregnable

From Scinde there is no news of interest. The Governor of Bombay was expected there in December, and will traverse the whole of that country. The only sickness complained of on the banks of the Indus is the small-pox

The Governor-General Lord Hardinge arrived at Meerut on the 1st of November, and proceeded to Cawnpore on the 2nd of that month. Lord Hardinge was to remain at Cawnpore some days, and to proceed thence to Lucknow, where the King of Oude was making preparations for his reception. A number of robbers had collected within the territories of Rajah, and were plundering the adjacent districts, but they were routed by Captain Magness, with some of the native forces.

The Nizam's country continued in its usual disturbed state. The Prime Minister had tendered his resignation in consequence of his inability to govern, while the Sovereign was labouring to paralyse all the efforts made to arrange the disorders. A strange act of cruelty is related of the Nizam's brother. Having detected his wife in adultery, he had her put to death in a strange manner. She was bound her, and sewn of her slave girls to be locked up in another apartment, having only eyelet holes through which he could witness their dying agonies. The relatives of the unfortunate lady have not been able to obtain redress, or order troops to attack the house, when she was released, nearly dead, from the horrible dungeon.

The Goomsoor districts remained in their former unsettled state. The Rajah of Ungool had not yet made his submission. The line of conduct ordered to be adopted towards those refractory districts had not yet been carried into effect.

Large quantities of rain had fallen in the end of October, which had produced freshes in the rivers. The late crops would derive considerable benefit from the rains.

The intelligence of the numerous failures in Europe, during the months of in August, September, and October, had produced much alarm in India. The alarm in Bombay continued, in consequence of more failures in England being apprehended.

The following casualties by death in the service of India, since the departure of the mail of the 1st of November, are reported in the Indian papers:—

Her Majesty's Troops: Ensign McBeath, 29th Foot, at Canonore, on the 23rd of October.

Bengal: Lieutenant J. Edw rdes, 49th Regiment, Adjutant of the 2nd Regiment Frontier Police, at Kangra, on the 26th of October; Lieutenant J. Mawinton, 53rd Regiment, at Chinsurah, on the 28th of October; Surgeon R. M'Nair, 42nd Regiment, at Delhi, on the 31st of October.

CHINA

Our advices from Hong Kong are to the 30th of October. The Peninsular and Oriental steamer Lady Mary Wood had arrived there on the 17th of that month, with the mail of the 24th of August, from London

A Gazette had appeared on the 22nd of October, announcing the appointment of Sir John Davis had left Hong Kong in her Majesty's steamer Vulture, on the 6th inst., for Cochin China, on a special mission, that Court, accompanied by her Majesty's ship Kingdome, and on y returned just before the departure of the mail. Sir John had not succeeded in obtaining an interview with the King of Cochin China, or admission to the capital, Hue (about eleven miles up the river); but nothing could exceed the civility and attention, amounting almost to servility, shown to him by all the high authorities. They were evidently under great alarm, the cruel treatment of the French Bishop but being fresh in their recollection.

His Excellency spent seventeen days in endeavouring to open negociations, but was, however, the wet season on that coast, the country around was inundated, and during the whole of the time the rain continued excessive. On the 23rd, a typhoon was experienced, and Sir John and Captain Macdougal were driven on shore in their boats, which afforded an opportunity to the mandarins for renewing their attentions and supplying them with every means of accommodation on shore.

Rear-Admiral Inglefield had sailed from Hong Kong in her Majesty's ship Vernon, on the 20th of October, for Manilla and the Straits. The old garrison, the 18th Royal Irish, and the 42nd Madras Native Infantry, were to embark early in November for India.

The markets for imports had been dull at Canton during the month of October, and the prices of most of the staple articles had either receded or were quite nominal, from the difficulty of realising sales, except in barter. Money was becoming scarce, and the rate of exchange

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The House met at four o'clock, when the Royal Assent was given by Commission to the Public Works (Ireland) Bill, the Crime and Outrage (Ireland) Bill, and the Bankers' Bill

BRIBERY AT ELECTIONS.—Lord BROUGHAM gave notice that he would, shortly after the recess, unless the Government or some noble Lord should anticipate him, bring in a bill for the prevention of bribery and corruption at elections. What had occurred at the late general election convinced him that something should be done to put a stop to such disgraceful proceedings.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.—On the motion of the Marquis of LANSDOWNE, that the House should adjourn until the 3rd of February, the Earl of ELLENBOROUGH objected to such a lengthened adjournment in the present circumstances of the country. The bill to suppress crime and outrage in Ireland was of so mild a character that it could hardly be expected to produce very material results, and the House should therefore continue sitting to pass more stringent measures if necessary. The very fact of their so sitting would of itself have a great tendency to quell those outrages. Since the meeting of Parliament the measures of any great moment had been passed; the only energetic steps taken by the Government appeared to be for the purpose of admitting a few millionaires to Parliament, and of casting a firebrand amongst the clergy of the Established Church. The Marquis of LANSDOWNE said, it was only because the Government did not believe that Parliament could with any useful effect legislate at present beyond the step they had taken in their endeavour to provide a remedy for the disorders and outrages in Ireland, that they had consented to the adjournment of the House at that period. He believed, that, within six weeks, the limit of their adjournment, the Government of Ireland would be enabled to try the experiment how far the powers entrusted to them would restore the disturbed parts of that country to tranquillity. But even if, within that period, circumstances should arise which should prove the insufficiency of the measure—though he prayed God no such circumstances might arise—the noble Lord knew that it was within the power of the Queen, with the consent of the two Houses of Parliament, to call Parliament together, even within any period of the adjournment, so as to enable them to adopt more efficacious measures, if such measures were necessary. He should not follow the noble Earl through the other observations which he had made. The noble Earl had stated various reasons why other measures should have been brought forward in this early session of Parliament, and had referred to one particular measure. That measure the Government had brought forward in order to complete the representation in the other House of Parliament, for, until a decision on that subject was come to, the representation of the people in the other House must necessarily remain imperfect. (Hear hear.) Adjourned to Thursday, February 3.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

New writs were ordered to be issued for Calne, in the room of Lord Shelburne, who has accepted the office of one of the Lords of the Treasury; and for Wells, in the room of Mr. Hayter, who has accepted the office of Judge-Advocate-General.

The SPEAKER informed the House that the recognizances in the cases of the following election petitions were approved, viz.:—Godlow, Aylesbury, Bewdley, North Staffordshire, Nottingham, Harwich, Andover, Stafford, Hythe, Cheltenham, Colchester, North Essex, Newcastle-under-Lyne, and Walsall.

FRIVATE BILLS OR PRIVATE BUSINESS.—Mr. HOSKINS moved that the House agree to the resolutions contained in the report from the Select Committee on private business, the substance of which was to give to the Chairman of Ways and Means similar authority in the case of private bills as was exercised by Lord Shaftesbury in the House of Lords. The right hon. gentleman said that, although he doubted if the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means could perform the additional duty, it would be thrown on him, he did not think the impossibility was yet sufficiently apparent to warrant him in proposing an additional officer.—Sir R. INGLIS suggested the propriety of appointing an Assistant-Speaker.—Motion agreed to.

JEWISH DISABILITIES BILL.

On the motion of Lord J. RUSSELL, this bill was read a first time, and the second reading was fixed for the 7th of February next.

Colonel SIBTHORP wished to know from the Prime Minister what would be the consequence, should the House sit on Saturdays, and even on Friday evenings, and should the Jews whom he proposed to admit refrain to attend. He (Colonel Sibthorp) anticipated that the noble Lord and his new associate Mr. Gladstone would ere long propose the admission of Mahomedans, and, indeed, he should not be surprised if the noble Lord at some day propose the devil himself for admission to Parliament. (Laughter.)

Lord J. RUSSELL said that the usual course, in case of a call of the House, was to take a greater number sitting to count convoy, from which he might afterwards be discharged on paying the fees. He thought he could answer for the Jews that they would readily pay the penalty should they not appear when called.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY.

On the motion that the House adjourn from its rising to Thursday, Feb. 3, Mr. SPOONER called attention to the distress existing in the manufacturing districts, and deprecated so long an adjournment. Nothing had been done to relieve the suffering industry of the country, and the Bank of England was still allowed to act on the shackles of the Act of 1844. The hon. member moved, as an amendment, that the House sojourn to the 16th January.

Mr. NEWDEGATE bore testimony to the lamentable prospects in the midland counties, and seconded the amendment.

Mr. MONSELL and Mr. P. SCROPE urged the necessity of preparing measures to give employment to the people of Ireland.

Mr. LABOUCHERE complained that there had been a want of energy and stringency in the two measures for the passing of which it seemed Parliament had been convened at so early a period.

Lord ASHLEY, Colonel SIBTHORP, and Mr. FAGAN made a few remarks.

Mr. GLADSTONE expressed a hope that the Minister would give an assurance that he would bring forward a measure on the subject of the Navigation Laws, in time sufficiently early to obtain the decision of Parliament upon it. The present session was peculiarly fitted for the consideration of the question, and he thought it ought to be settled before the termination of the session.

Mr. HERRIES recommended Mr. Spooner not to press his amendment.

Lord J. RUSSELL said that, as the Government would not be asked for public money to support the unemployed people of England, so no money out of the Imperial Treasury could be given to the unemployed poor of Ireland, unless it should be clearly shown that all the means obtainable under the Irish Poor Law Act were exhausted. He was not able to say when he would introduce a measure relative to the Navigation Laws, but he was fully alive to the necessity of bringing it forward at such a time as to obtain for it full discussion. He likewise would not introduce immediately after the recess some of the Irish remedial measures which had been promised. The Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland was applying himself to the consideration of the state of Ireland with his usual vigour and energy; and would not decide definitively on any measure whether any and what measures might be adopted for their relief.

Lord MORPETH gave notice that on the 18th of February he would move for leave to bring in a bill for promoting the public health.

To a question put by Mr. HORSMAN, Sir GEORGE GREY replied that Lord Ashley had, three years ago, expressed a desire to retire from the Ecclesiastical Commission, and Lord Sandon had been appointed in his stead.

Several unopposed returns were ordered.

The NEW ZEALAND GOVERNMENT BILL was read a second time, and was ordered to be committed on the 4th of February

The Report of the Committee of Supply was received.

The House adjourned at half-past eight o'clock to Thursday, the 3rd of February.

ESCAPE OF SEVEN PRISONERS FROM HUNTINGDON GAOL.—At an early hour on Thursday morning (last week), Mr. Mayor, governor, deemed that several of the nine prisoners who had been confined in a ward for trial, were gone. Nearly all the locks of the cells had been forcibly opened, and the straw beds which had stopped open the doors, the bed-cases had been securely attached to each other by a "sailor's knot," and formed a rope, by which they scaled the boundary wall, having first broken asunder a solid iron bar in the fence of the ward, 1½ inch square, and ten feet long, which passed through an area where a watch-door ranged the interior of the prison by night; he, however, gave no alarm. During Thursday, the prison was inspected by J. B. Hooper, Esq., J. H. Heathcote, Esq., the two of the visiting justices; also, by the Right Hon. the Earl of Sandwich, F. Tillard, Esq., and numerous others of the gentry of the town and county, who observed the great skill and the dexterity by which the plan for the escape had been executed

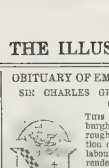
OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

SIR CHARLES GRANVILLE STUART MENTEATH, BART., OF CLOSEBURN, CO. DUMFRIES.



THIS excellent and public-spirited gentleman died at Edinburgh on the 3rd inst., deeply lamented. Few were so thoroughly identified with the interesting and picturesque section of the country, the Nith Waters; and fewer still ever laboured with the same assiduity, intelligence, and skill, to render a broad domain alike improving, fruitful, and ornamental in short, an honour to the whole South of Scotland. Among the earliest and most ardent reclaimers of land, Sir Charles had no equal in his own county; and, during a long life, he established, by his kindly feelings, and generous sympathies, a claim to the regard of thousands.

Paternally descended from the famous historic family of Menteith, the deceased Baronet was, through his mother, derived from the great English house of Huntingdon, and thus allied to the Royal line of Plantagenet. The name of Menteath is local, a considerable district in North Britain, through which the river Teath runs, being called the Stewartry of Menteath. Of the original family, which thence assumed its designation, the heiress, the Countess of Menteith, married, in 1258, Walter, third son of the High Steward of Scotland, and became foundress of the Menteiths, Earls of Menteith, and the Menteiths of Ruskey, West Carse, and Closeburn. To Sir John Menteith, Governor of Dumbarton Castle, tradition ascribes (whether truly or not is still a point of historic doubt) the surrender of Sir William Wallace.

Sir Charles Menteath, whose death we record, was born 15th May, 1760, and had thus completed his seventy-eighth year. By Lucretia, his wife, daughter of Thomas Langhan, Esq., and granddaughter of Robert Fergusson, Esq., of Craigdarroch, he has left seven sons and two daughters: the eldest of the former is the present Sir James Stuart Menteath, Bart., of Closeburn, and the elder of the latter is Philadelphia, Countess of Mar.

PRINCE PAUL OF WURTEMBERG

PRINCE PAUL CHARLES FREDERICK AUGUSTUS of Wurtemberg was son of Frederick, late King, and brother of William, present King of Wurtemberg. He was born on the 19th June, 1785, and married, the 28th September, 1820, the Princess Catharine Charlotte, daughter of the Frederick, late Reigning Duke of Saxe Altenburg. Prince Paul leaves issue, by his consort, who survives him, two sons, Prince Frederick and Prince Augustus, and two daughters, one the Grand Duchess Helena, wife of the Grand Duke Michael of Russia, the other the Duchess Dowager Pauline of Nassau. The death of Prince Paul occurred recently, after a painful and protracted illness.

MAJOR-GENERAL STELLI.

THIS gal . . . officer, who died on the 1st inst., at his residence near Richmond, Surrey, entered the army in 1804, and became a general officer in 1847. He served with the Coldstream Guards in the Peninsula during the greater period of the war.

MAJOR LEARD.

MAJOR GEORGE LEARD, late of the 16th Lancers, was a distinguished officer in the British service. He was with our armies in the Peninsula, France, and Flanders, from 1809 to the peace. He entered the army as a Cornet, in 1802, and retired on half pay, in 1826. Major Luard died on the 19th instant, at Salisbury, aged fifty-nine.

MR. BRANDON

MR JOSHUA ARTHUR BRANDON, of Beaufort-buildings, was a rising architect, of great promise. He was one of the authors of the "Analysis of Gothic Architecture." His recent early death, at the very outset of his career, is deeply to be regretted.

THOMAS BARKER.

THIS gentleman, who may be styled the patriarch of English artists, was an exhibitor of the British Institution for nearly half a century. Mr. Barker painted the well-known picture of "The Woodman," and also other popular pictures; all of which, during the last sixty years, have been copied thousands of times. The painting of "The Woodman," which was executed at the early age of fifteen, and which was the likeness of a gardener near the Park, was sold to Alderman Boydell for seven hundred guineas. Mr. Barker died recently at Bath. Although his years numbered nearly four score, his mental powers continued to retain all the vigour and freshness of youth.

FATAL RESULT OF A RAILWAY ACCIDENT. On the 27th of October last, Mr. Ross, the superintendent of the Glasgow and Greenock Railway, slipped in coming off a locomotive engine at the Port Glasgow station, his foot got entangled with the wheels of the engine while it was yet in motion, and it was found necessary to amputate one limb, and part of the foot of the other. For a time he seemed to do well, but from the first, Mr. Ross's advanced years, and the great injury he had sustained, prevented any sanguine hope being entertained of his recovery, and notwithstanding all that medical skill could accomplish, he died on Tuesday last.

MARITIME DISASTERS.—Amongst the casualties in the Bristol Channel, during the past week, are, the brig Dora de Genova, from Odessa, with wheat, to Messrs. Spillar and Brown, of Bridgwater, driven ashore at Burnham, near Highbridge Pier; and another barque stranded near Swansea.

CHRISTMAS PICTURES.

In another page, we have glanced, by way of picture, at the olden glories of Christmas—bygone, in all probability, never to be resuscitated.

It is hardly worth while to enquire what has led to the discontinuance of the spectacles of this festive season; or, rather, what has diverted men's joy at the return of the day—from to us unseemly revel, and roistering—into channels of holier observance, and of rejoicing, tempered with moderation and pious reflection.

The religious commemoration of the day remains intact, as an ecclesiastical usage coeval with the great event which it keeps in remembrance. "The close of the year," says a late illustrator of our "Feasts and Fasts," "brought round in the Western, and from the age of Chrysostom also in the Eastern, Church, the celebration of the birth of Christ: to use the words of the father whom we have just named, that 'most venerable, most astonishing, of festivals, the fountain whence the other great festivals flowed, for had Christ not been born he would not have been baptised, which is the Epiphany; he would not have been crucified, which is the Passover; he would not have sent down the Spirit, which is Pentecost. But not only on that account,' he continues, 'is this festival worthy of pre-eminence, but because what happened upon it is more astonishing than what happened upon the others; for that Christ should die was a natural consequence of his having been born a man; for though he did so in fact, yet he had assumed a mortal body; but that being God, he should be willing to become man, and to endure to humble himself to a degree which thought cannot follow, is most awful, most full of amazement.'"

Hence, we find the observance of the festival to have been almost entirely spontaneous. In the work just quoted it is stated that: "Christmas Day, like Sunday, was forbidden to be kept as a fast by the Council of Braga (A.D. 563); which anathematised such as 'did not duly honour the birthday of Christ, according to the flesh, but pretended to honour it by fasting on that day'; a practice attributed by this canon, and by Pope Leo the First, to the same conception which led to the practice of fasting on the Lord's Day, namely, the belief that Christ was not truly born in the nature of man. But, as the practice, probably, became extinct in later times, no repetition of this canon has come within our observation. Nor are we acquainted with any other positive regulations specially affecting the observance of Christmas."

We pass from these sacred usages to the more secular observances which our Artists have this year chosen for their illustration of the season. And, first, of

CHRISTMAS EVE.

The old poets have left us many charming pictures of Christmas Eve (Dec. 24), celebrated because Christmas Day, in the primitive Church, was always observed as the Sabbath-day; and, like it, preceded by an Eve, or Vigil. For our present purpose, we prefer a picture painted by a poet of our own time—with a little garniture from other hands, it is true, but, altogether, homely and life-like, picturesque and poetical. It is from the series of Notices of the Months, by Thomas Miller, in the "Illustrated London Almanack" for the present year:—

Dreary would December be, did it not bring with it merry Christmas, with its holly, and ivy, and mistletoe, through the leaves of which peep the scarlet, and purple, and still white berries, giving a green and summer appearance to our rooms, and throwing a cheerfulness around our hearths. We see the laden cooling past our window, piled high with game, hares, and pheasants; and great white geese, and black turkeys, whose plumage the wind lifts back as they swing suspended from the roof; conjuring up visions of huge comfortable fires, well-spread tables, and happy faces, all congregated to do honour to good old Christmas, whom Sunday has beautifully drawn as seated beside the high-heaped hearth in his great armed-chair, watching the children at their sports, or pausing at times to stir the huge fire, and every now and then sipping the bright brown ale. The night before the happy season arrives, we hear the village bells, awakening the surrounding silence by their silver music, and throwing a cheerful sound over the wild wintry landscape. When the morning of that old and holy day arrives, we hear the rustic waits chanting some simple Christmas Carol, as they stand in the grey moonlight, at the front of the picturesque parsonage-house, telling how Christ was on that day born, and that, while shepherds were attending their flocks by night, the Angel of the Lord descended, and proclaimed tidings of peace and good-will to all mankind. How plaintive and tremulous do those old chants fall upon the ear, shaking noiselessly and peacefully into the heart, and filling the soul with a holy and reverential awe; and, while the cock from the neighbouring farm makes answer to the Carol of the village waits, we recall that exquisite passage of Shakspeare, in which, alluding to some old superstition, he says:

> Some say that, ever 'gainst that season comes
> Wherein our Saviour's birth is celebrated,
> This bird of dawning singeth all night long.

Or we turn to these by-gone times, so beautifully and feelingly described by Irving, who says:—"Christmas seemed to throw open every door, and unlock every heart. It brought the peasant and the poor together, and blended all ranks in one warm generous flow of joy and kindness. The old halls of castles and manor houses resounded with the harp and the Christmas Carol, and their ample boards groaned with the weight of hospitality. Even the poorest cottage welcomed the festive season with green decorations of bay and holly: the cheerful fire glanced its rays through the lattice, inviting the passenger to raise the latch and join the group knelt huddled round the hearth, beguiling the long evening with legendary jokes and oft told Christmas tales."

Wordsworth, too, has given us a delightful "Picture of Christmas Eve" addressed from his mountain retreat to his brother, "on the proud margin of the Thames." The poem opens thus:—

CHRISTMAS PICTURES.

The minstrels played their Christmas tune
To-night beneath my cottage eaves;
While, smitten by a lofty moon,
The encircling laurels, thick with leaves,
Gave back a rich and dazzling sheen,
That overpowered their natural green!

Through hill and valley every breeze
Had sunk to rest with folded wings;
Keen was the air, but could not freeze,
Nor check the music of the strings;
So stout and hardy were the band
That scraped the chords with strenuous hand.

And who but listened? till was paid
Respect to every inmate's claim;
The greeting given, the music played
In honour of each household name,
Duly pronounced with loud long call,
And "merrie Christmas" wished to all.

Oh brother! I revere the choice
That took thee from thy native hills;

* * * *

Yet, would that thou, with me and mine,
Hadst heard this never-failing rite;
And seen on other faces shine
A true revival of the light,
Which Nature, and these rustic powers,
In simple Childhood spread through ours!

For pleasure hath not ceased to wait
On these expected annual rounds,
Whether the rich man's sumptuous gate
Call forth the unelaborate sounds,
Or they are offered at the door
That guards the lowliest of the poor.

SNAP-DRAGON.

SNAP-DRAGON.

This is a Christmas pastime of no great antiquity. Dr. Johnson gravely defines it as "a kind of play, in which brandy is set on fire, and raisins thrown into it, which those who are unused to the sport are afraid to take out, but which may be safely snatched by a quick motion, and put blazing into the mouth, which being closed, the fire is at once extinguished." Strutt's account of the affair is somewhat more candid than the lexicographer's: he tells us—"This sport is seldom exhibited but in winter, and chiefly at Christmas time: it is simply heating of brandy, or some other ardent spirit, in a dish with raisins; when, the brandy being set on fire, the young folks of both sexes, standing round it, pluck out the raisins, and eat them as hastily as they can, but rare y without burning their hands, or scalding their mouths."

However, it may soon be decided which definition is the most perfect. The sport affords much fun in a darkened room; not the least of which is the spectral appearance of the young players from the spirit flame.

Although much of the custom of profuse hospitality has passed away, Christmas is yet universally recognised as a season when every good Christian shows his gratitude to the Almighty, for the inestimable benefits procured to us by the Nativity of our Blessed Saviour, by an ample display of good will towards our fellow-men. This, however, is the season for the exercise of hospitality—and that threefold: "for one's family; this is of necessity: for strangers; this is of courtesie: for the poore; this is charity." Or, as old Tusser sings:—

> At Christmas be merry, and thankful withal,
> And feast thy poor neighbours, the great with the small.

We must, now, leave the chants and carols of other days, the minstrelsy and the boisterous mirth of a more picturesque age than our own, and join the Christmas-Day Family-Party which our Artist has assembled in his Illustration. And, here we may remark that custom immemorial hath stamped the Family Party at Christmas as the most sincere and genuine meeting of the whole year. Many an imagined wrong, and many a heartburning is soothed by the season of hallowed mirth. The sweet sanctity of its associations seems to shut out all meaner joys.

Well, the party have left the substantial luxuries of the dinner table, and are now enjoying the more refined delights that spring from the interchange of affection reared around the same hearth—the same fond home. The room is cosy, nay luxurious, in its appointments, and there is the very atmosphere of hospitality and enjoyment throughout the place. The family pictures are decorated by the holly tree, as if "to commemorate the victory gained over the powers of darkness by the coming of Christ." What a radius of joy and hope does this reflected light shed over the happy party!

View the deepening circle: the grandfather, in his easy Ashburnham chair, his heart brimming o'er with gladness. Opposite are seated the matrons of the party, whose delight in "talking over old times," is one of those touches of nature that the painter loves—his conversation-scenes. To be brief, in this beaming circle we see almost every phase of existence—from the cradle to the grave; old age watching the gambols of early childhood: in short, mid-age, manhood, and youth—every stage of a generation is portrayed in our artist's Christmas Circle. And such scenes will not be rare to-morrow, throughout the length and breadth of the land:

> In town or hamlet, shalt'ring middle life,
> Down to the cottag'd vale, and straw-roof'd shed
> This western isle hath long been fam'd for scenes
> Where bliss domestic finds a dwelling-place.
> Domestic bliss, that, like a harmless dove,
> (Honour and sweet endearment keeping guard),
> Can centre in a little quiet nest
> All that desire could fly for through the earth;
> That can, the world eluding, be itself
> A world enjoyed; that wants no witnesses
> But its own sharers, and approving Heaven.
> That, like a flow'r deep hid in rocky cleft,
> Smiles, though 'tis looking only at the sky.—KENNEDY.

THE CHILDREN'S CHRISTMAS PARTY.

> Ah! that I were once more a careless child. COLERIDGE.

Of all the festivities of the season, this is, in many respects, the most interesting. It has more of the simplicity of the festival than any other scene of its commemoration: there is such innocent gaiety, and brimming mirth in a party of frolicsome children, that we are not surprised at the fondness of painters for children as impersonations of purity and as the attributes of virtue.

Who is there that has not, in after-life, looked back upon childhood, and there seen what innocence he hath outlived. How fondly, too, does he remember this season of presents, anxiously counted on for months before-hand. So, in the Kinderlied, or Child's Song:—

> Now Christmas is come, and now Papa's come home,
> With a pegtop for Tommie, a husif for Sue;
> A new bag o' marbles for Dick, and for Joan
> A workbox, for Phœbe a bow for her shoe,
> For Cecily, singing, a humming-top comes;
> For dull drowsie Marie a sleeping-top mee t;
> For Ben, Ned, and Harry, a fife and two drums;
> For Jamie a box of nice sugar-plums sweet.

Our Artist has shown the little ones in high glee: the room is brilliantly lighted; and, before it has become heated, the freshness and tender beauty of the children may be seen to perfection. As the evening advances, the dance grows fast, and the animal spirits gush out in many a long and loud laugh. A game of forfeits, or some slight sport in which there is a chance for the exercise of small skill, is often the occasion of boisterous mirth; there is a prolonged titter amidst the bevy of children; one less versed in practical joking than his companions, is tricked and laughed at; but, in the pure simplicity of childhood, "he kisses and loves all, and when the smart of the rod is past, smiles on his beater." Alack! "we laugh at his foolish sports, but his game is our earnest; and his drums, rattles, and hobby-horses, but the emblems and mocking of man's business."

Sometimes, a wayward child will not join in the sport; for, childhood has its sours as well as its sweets, even though it be described as a purely happy state. Then, the waggish uncle shirks into a corner, and must be coaxed, and petted, and dandled, and teased on, with a bait of sugar—to rejoin the merry throng. Really, these lovely appearance almost makes us impugn Coleridge's apostrophe—"How inimitably graceful children are in general before they learn to dance."

We remember, some seventeen years since, a charming paper "On Childhood," in the New Monthly Magazine, wherein the delights of a party of children are thus glanced at:—

> I love a children's ball—that is, a ball for very young children; for when they approach their teens they begin gradually to throw off their angelic disguise preparatory to becoming men and women: the germs of vanity, dissimulation, and pride are visible; the young eye roves for admiration, the head is held high on contact with vulgarity; the lips speak a different language from the less deceitful brow. If the object of entertainment was really to entertain, we ought only to invite children; because, if not quite sure of succeeding in our aim, we at least can discover whether or not we have attained it. In a party of children, ninety-nine out of a hundred consider themselves at the summit of human felicity, and take no care to conceal their sentiments; and if the unlucky hundredth happens to fall down, or to be affronted, a few tears and a little outery show you where your assistance is required, and allow you to set matters right again by coaxing and sugar-plums. These occasional eccentric movements in the quadrille, proceeding from the exuberance of spirits and of joy, these bursts of merriment which sometimes take the bosom of politeness, the frowns of a smiling mamma; those peals of young laughter so thrilling and so infectious; those animated voices and bright faces assure the donors of the feast that they have conferred a few hours of exquisite happiness on the dear little beings around them, afforded them food for chattering and mirth for many days, and perhaps planted in their grateful memories one of those sunny spots to which the man looks back with pleasure and wonder, when sated, wearied, and disappointed, he sees with surprise how easily and how keenly he was once delighted.

Juvenile Balls, as these parties are somewhat affectedly called, are now becoming more frequent than hitherto in the higher circles. The example of the young Royal Family have, doubtless, contributed to this fashion. For such entertainments, the arrangements are as complete as for those of larger growth. The little host or hostess receives the company in due form, and is recognised as the entertainer throughout the evening. The supper is lighter, yet more ornamental, than on other occasions; and of course the whole affair terminates at a much earlier hour.

THE CHRISTMAS CAROL.

THE CAROL.

The Carol, as most of our readers probably remember, is derived from the Italian carola, a song of joy. It is almost universally sung at Christmas, on the Continent. It is likewise sung in Ireland and in Wales, but in Scotland it is unknown. In various parts of England, within the present century, the singing of Carols began on Christmas Eve, and was continued late into the night. On Christmas Day these Carols took the place of Psalms in the churches, the whole congregation joining; and at the end, the clerk declared, in a loud voice, his wishes for a merry Christmas and a happy New Year to all the parishioners. Still, these Carols differed materially from those of earlier times, which were festal chansons for enlivening Christmas, and not songs of Scripture history; the change having been made by the Puritans.

Of the latter class is the well-known ditty, "God rest ye merry gentlemen," which our Artist has put into the hands and mouth of his "poor but pious minstrel." The charity school-boy, who is gazing at the singers, bears in his hand what may have proved a rival to the caroling—his "school-piece." We have a distinct recollection of carols being commonly sung in the streets of London, at Christmas; and of the Bellman's Sheet of Verses on the Nativity, embellished with prints of the Saints and the Holy Family: such things are now, comparatively, rare. In the Literary Gazette for 1840, we remember mention of a gipsy girl wandering up and down Berkshire, chanting a rude and imperfect recitative to the air of "My Peggy is a wee thing," and commencing

Oh! Joseph was an old man,
And an old man was he,
And he married Mary
From the land of Galilee, &c.

Leaving the minstrelsy of the highway, we may note that, of late, there has been a sort of revival of taste for the Scriptural Carol. Last year, two or three reprinted collections appeared; one of them illuminated in gold and colour, after the manner of an ancient missal.

The custom has been thus glanced at by an old divine:—"Welcome! thrice blessed day! the desire of all nations, whose distant glories made the father of the faithful to rejoice, and whose approaches filled the world with wonder and expectation: thou wert ushered in with angelic hymns, and celebrated ever since with anthems of praise, because thou didst bring forth joy and a Redeemer to mankind."

The Christmas party is broken up; the last good wish of the season—the last kiss—has been exchanged; and the visitors are on the threshold, attended by the entertainers. The house has a manorial character about it; it is not in the heavy, magnificent style of Bracebridge Hall, wherein "were kept up the old games of hoodman blind, shoe the wild mare, hot cockles, bob apple, and snap-dragon; the yule log, and Christmas candles were regularly burnt, and the misletoe, with its white berries, hung up, to the imminent peril of all the pretty housemaids."

Our Artist's mansion is, however, a "proper house and home;" it has many chimney-shafts—"wind-pipes of hospitality:" and it has, moreover, that indication of old English comfort—a porch. Here is the leave-taking: the servant has brought the lantern, which seems strangely to have tempted the waggery of a snow-baller. The visitors are well wrapped up—and we wish them a safe ride home.

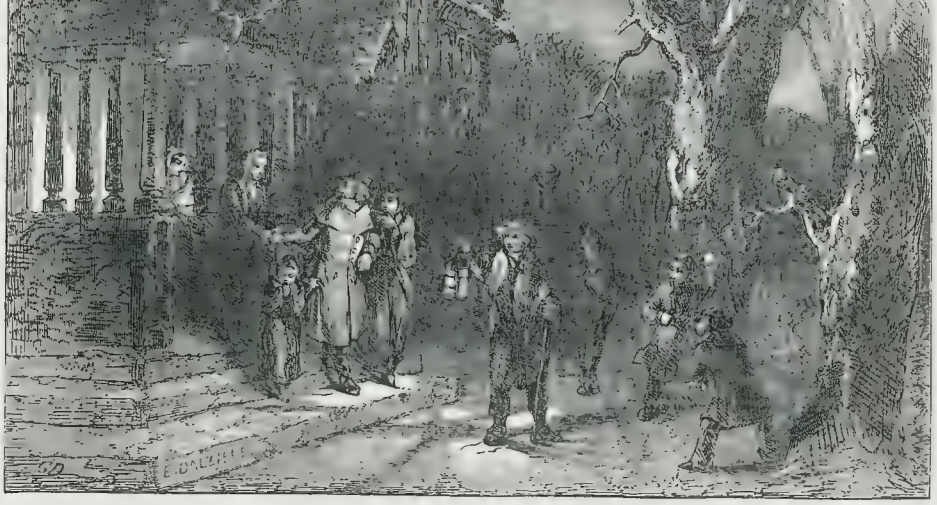
GOING HOME.—"GOOD NIGHT!"

Well! the party is over; and here is depicted the start for the return home. It appears a bitter night, but yet, such as our Poet rejoiceth in. "In our eye," says the "Almanack," "Christmas never looks so beautiful as when it has been ushered in by snow, and frost, and rime; when the thatched roofs of the cottages are whitened over, and the branches of the trees are laden with feathery flakes; when the ivy that covers the grey and weather-beaten church porch is half buried beneath the weight of accumulated snow, as if

Nature, in awe to Him,
Had doffed her gaudy trim,
With her great Master so to sympathise,
Hiding her guilty front with innocent snow."

And now, good readers, our descriptive task is over. If there should be any of you disposed to question the fitness or extent of the illustrations of the Season, we would reply in the words of Washington Irving, penned, perhaps, a quarter of a century since, but still more applicable in the present day than when written:—

But, enough of Christmas and its gambols; it is time for me to pause in this garrulity. Methinks, I hear the questions asked by my graver readers, "To what purpose is all this—how is the world to be made wiser by this trash?" Alas! is there not wisdom enough extant for the instruction of the world? Alas, indeed, are there not thousands of abler pens labouring for its improvement? It is much pleasanter to please than to instruct—to play the companion rather than the preceptor. What, after all, is the mass of wisdom that I could throw into the mass of knowledge; or how am I sure that my sagest deductions may be safe guides for the opinions of others? But, in writing to amuse, if I fail, the only evil is my own disappointment. If, however, I can, by any lucky chance, in these days of evil, rub out one wrinkle from the brow of care, or beguile the heavy heart of one moment of sorrow; if I can, now and then, penetrate through the gathering film of misanthropy, prompt a benevolent view of human nature, and make my reader more in good humour with his fellow-beings and himself, surely, surely, I shall not then have written entirely in vain.



THE RETURN HOME—"GOOD NIGHT."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

 In consequence of CHRISTMAS DAY falling on Saturday, we, this week, publish our Journal on Friday, the 24th.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 25, 1847.

THE week has, of course, been barren of political interest, with the exception of the brief declaration by Lord John Russell of what the future course of the Government will be with respect to the distress in Ireland. The Executive has a reserve of provisions in hand, left from the last distribution; the public works, left unfinished, are to be completed under the Act of the present session, and, above all, the power of the New Poor-Law is to be tested to the utmost. The Government declares sternly it will not excuse the landed and resident proprietors from an iota of their liabilities. It reckons on their co-operation, which must be given by the employment of labour and other means. They are now legally responsible for the consequences of neglect, and now, for the first time, it may be said that Ireland is brought within the pale of the old law of England, which gives every man a lien on the property of the nation. However much the law may be abused in the early period of its working, whether by the prejudice of the people or the dislike of the proprietors, there it is, an existing thing, of quite a different cast to the Land Laws which have, from time to time, been passed within the last century. It will, in the course of time, make it the interest of the possessors of property that it should sustain or maintain else than a horde of pauper tenants. The whole system of parochial duty, which has such a vast effect on English society, has yet to be learned in Ireland, where nothing like it has existed. As yet, there is a reluctance, perhaps a disagreeable difficulty, in discharging such duties. From the account given of the proceedings of the Government officers during the darkest period of the last famine by a writer in the Edinburgh Review, it appears that the burden of all the functions of relief, employment, and superintendence of a mass of population doubling the number of the largest army that was ever banded, fell on the few paid officials of the Government. It is a new era in social Government that is now opening in Ireland, and we must be prepared for some ignorance, many errors, and great complaints. But the element of a better state of things is there, and will work its way through infinite confusions. Till the Poor Law is proved an economic impossibility—till it utterly fails, not from defective administration but from inherent defects—no more money will be voted by Parliament from the Consolidated Fund.

THE WEATHER.

THE weather at the first part of the week was remarkable for the high and uniform temperature of the air, and, at the latter part of it, for its low temperature. The sky has been nearly always clouded. During Friday and Saturday, the wind, at times, almost amounted to a gale; its direction was S. On Monday, a change of wind took place; a considerable change of temperature has taken place; and, at the end of the week, the weather was more seasonable than it has been for some time

The following are some particulars for each day:—Thursday, the sky was overcast till noon, and partially free from cloud till 9h. P.M., and again overcast before midnight. The direction of the wind was S. in the morning, and S.S.W after noon. The average temperature of the day was 48°, being about 4° above the average for the season. Friday, the sky was nearly overcast throughout the day, with a thin rain falling at different times; the direction of the wind was principally S, and blowing strongly; the average temperature for the day was 5.°, being more than 11° above the average for the season. Saturday the sky was overcast all day, and a slight rain was falling during the greater part of it; the barometer reading was again low on this day, being 29 In. 2 at 7h. P.M., after which time it began to increase. Sunday, the sky was mostly covered by cloud throughout the day, the place of the moon being visible during the evening; the direction of the wind was S.W.; the average temperature for the day was 39½°. Monday, the sky was overcast all day: the direction of the wind was N., and the average temperature for the day was 37½°. Tuesday the sky was covered by cloud all the day; the direction of the wind was N.N.E.; and the average temperature was 24½°, being 18½° less than it was on the preceding Friday. Wednesday, the sky was overcast all day, the wind was E.; and the average temperature of the day was 33°; and that for the week ending this day, was 41°.

The extreme thermometrical readings for each day were:—

Thursday,	Dec. 16	the highest during the day was 54	deg., and the lowest was 43 deg.
Friday,	Dec. 17	" " 54	" " 43
Saturday,	Dec. 18	" " 51	" " 40
Sunday,	Dec. 19	" " 49	" " 39
Monday,	Dec. 20	" " 43½	" " 35
Tuesday,	Dec. 21	" " 34½	" " 30
Wednesday,	Dec. 22	" " 35	" " 31

On Thursday, at 1h. P.M., the reading of the thermometer was 51½ nearly, and from this time till Saturday morning at 7h., the readings were always between 46° and 54°, being remarkable both for their high values and their uniformity; after 7h. A.M. on Saturday, the readings declined, and continued doing so all day; at midnight, the reading was 40°, and early on the morning of Sunday, it was as low as 30°, being 24° nearly less than it was at the same time on the preceding day. During Sunday, the reading increased to 49° at 1h. P.M., and declined afterwards to 40° at midnight, and continued at this reading throughout the night, and till 8h. A.M. on the morning of Monday, after which time it decreased throughout the day, till, at midnight, it was 35°, and it decreased afterwards to 32° by 8h. A.M. on the morning of Tuesday; and, on Tuesday, it only increased to 34½° during the day, and decreased to 30° at night. From these remarks, it will be seen that the usual diurnal rise and fall in the readings of the thermometer have not taken place.

Blackheath, Wednesday, December 22, 1847. J. G.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT OSBORNE.

The Queen and Prince Albert took a drive in an open carriage, on Friday afternoon.

On Saturday the unfavourable state of the weather prevented her Majesty and Prince Albert, and the Royal children, from taking their usual walks and rides. The Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay and Sir James Clark arrived on a visit to her Majesty, and had the honour of joining the Royal dinner circle in the evening.

On Sunday, Her Majesty and Prince Albert, and the ladies and gentlemen of the Royal suite, attended divine service. The Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay officiated.

Most of the Cabinet Ministers left town on Tuesday to spend the Christmas recess—Lord and Lady John Russell and family and the Chancellor of the Exchequer to visit the Duke of Bedford, at Woburn, where Royal Graces will receive a succession of distinguished visitors for some weeks. Lord Lansdowne to Bowood. Earl Grey and family to Howick Hall, on Wednesday, for a few days. Lord and Lady Palmerston to visit Broadlands, on Tuesday, where they will entertain a succession of visitors. The Hon. Col. Keppel, M.P., has left town for the seat of his father, the Earl of Albemarle, in Suffolk.

Lord Brougham left Cradoc-street on Wednesday for Paris, en route to his Lordship's chateau near Cannes, where the noble and learned Lord is expected to remain until the re-assembling of Parliament after the recess

RETURN OF THE COURT TO WINDSOR.

On Tuesday, the Queen and Prince Albert, with the Royal Family, arrived from Osborne at the Castle at twenty-five minutes before three o'clock in the afternoon. Her Majesty and the Princes were attended by the Viscountess Canning (Lady in Waiting), the Hon. Miss Kerr (Maid of Honour in Waiting), Colonel the Hon. Charles Grey (Equerry in Waiting), Colonel Bouverie (Equerry in Waiting to his Royal Highness), and Major General Sir Thomas Bowles (Master of the Household). The august party was escorted by a party of the Royal Regiment of Horse Guards. The Queen and Prince Albert were received at the grand entrance to the Castle by Lord Waterpark (Lord in Waiting) and Capt. the Hon. A. N. Hood.

POPULATION AND POOR RATES.—A return, printed by order of the House of Commons, on the motion of Sir R. Ferguson, shows, that the annual value of the property rated to the poor in England is £262,140,030; in Scotland, to £9,320,784; in Ireland, to £13,304,234. The expenditure for the relief and maintenance of the poor (1846—46) amounted, in England, to £6,984,204; in Scotland, to £338,932; and in Ireland, to £425,184. The rate in the pound, and expenditure for the relief of the poor on the annual value of the property rated to the same, amounted, in England, to 1s. 7d.; in Scotland, to 7¼d.; and in Ireland, to 1s. 7d. The total number of paupers relieved, including casual poor, amounted, in England, to 1,330,587; in Scotland, to 96,356; and in Ireland, to 27,235. The proportion per cent. of the number of paupers relieved to the population was in England, 8.4; in Scotland, 3.7; and in Ireland, 3.1. The rate per head of the expenditure on the total number of paupers relieved amounted, in England, to £5 14s. 5¼d.; in Scotland, to £3 0s. 9¾d.; and in Ireland, to £2 13s. 0¼d.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

THE unseemly jars which have of late drawn such general and painful attention on the part of the public to the internal organisation of the Government of the Church, continue.

THE APPOINTMENT OF DR. HAMPDEN TO THE SEE OF HEREFORD still presents itself as the quæstio vexata that it was last week. The Dean of Hereford has presented to the Queen, through her Majesty's Prime Minister, on the subject of the nomination of this Divine to the See of Hereford, a memorial, in which he refers to the vote of censure passed on Dr. Hampden by the University of Oxford, and pleads for that right and liberty of conscience which will be "trampled to the very dust" by a compulsion to elect a person still under that censure. On this ground he prays either that her Majesty will recommend some other person, or that she will graciously relieve the Chapter from the necessity of proceeding to the election, till she has been pleased to submit Dr. Hampden's publications "to the judgment, either of the two Houses of Convocation of Clergy of the province of Canterbury, which is now sitting, or of the Provincial Council of Bishops of the same province, assisted by such Divines as her Majesty, or the said Provincial Council, shall be pleased to call, or of some other competent tribunal which her Majesty shall be graciously pleased to appoint."

Dr. Hampden himself has also published a letter, addressed to Lord John Russell, which contains a long and lengthened defence of his religious opinions, and in which he denies that he is de facto or de jure under "the censure of the University."

His Grace the Duke of Sutherland has addressed to the Rev. Dr. Bowles, Vicar of Stanton Lacy, a letter, dated Trentham, Dec. 18th, relative to the appointment of Dr. Hampden to the see of Hereford. His Grace, after expressing his great satisfaction with the appointment, says: "I happen to have means of knowing that when Lord Granville proposed Dr. Hampden to St. Mary Hall, he was not acquainted personally with him, but collected to the best of his power the opinion of the University at that time, when Dr. Hampden's Lectures had already been for some months before the public. The preponderance of opinion was great in his favour. Some of those who have since been most bitterly violent then recommended him. I believe that no disapprobation was expressed until the publication of his pamphlet in favour of the admission of Dissenters to the University. I have written this from feeling sure that it will be interesting to you to know the opinion of such an authority as Lord Granville, and you may make any use of the information I am thus able to give that may seem desirable.—Very truly yours, SUTHERLAND. The Rev. J. Bowles, D.D., Stanton Lacy, Ludlow."

A body of the clergy, resident within the Archdeaconry of Coventry, have protested against the petition about to be presented to her Majesty from certain of their brother clergymen of that Archdeaconry against the appointment of Dr. Hampden.

WHAT IS THE OFFENCE OF PREMUNIRE?—It is contempt of the Queen and her Government, and it is so called, says Blackstone, from the words of the writ prosecutory to the prosecution thereof. It is enacted by the 25th Henry VIII., c. 20, that if the Dean and Chapter refuse to elect the person named by the Sovereign, or any Archbishop or Bishop to confirm or consecrate him, they shall fall into the penalties of the statute of provisors of late by the commission of this offence is thus stated by Coke:—"That, from the conviction, the defendant shall be out of the King's protection, and his lands and tenements, goods and chattels forfeited to the King, and that his body shall remain in prison at the King's pleasure; or (as other authorities have it) during life." So odious, says Coke, was this offence, that a man that was attainted of it might have been slain by any other man without danger of law: because, it was provided by law that any man might do to him as to the King's enemy, and any man may lawfully kill an enemy. If any Archbishop or Bishop be contemplating the commission of this offence, it will be as well that he should understand that it is no longer lawful for individuals or the mob to inflict summary punishment. The statute, 5th Elizabeth, c. 1, provides that it shall not be lawful to kill any person attainted in a præmunire, any law, statute, opinion, or argument of law to the contrary notwithstanding. But still, such delinquent, says Blackstone, though protected as a part of the public from public wrongs, can bring no action for any private injury, how atrocious soever, being so far out of the protection of the law that it will not guard his civil rights, nor remedy any grievance which he as an individual may suffer. And no man knowing him to be guilty can with safety give him comfort.

METROPOLITAN NEWS

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.

The Report issued by the Registrar-General this week, presents the health of the metropolis under a more favourable aspect than it has exhibited for some weeks past. Last week the total number of deaths that had occurred amounted to 2416, out of a population numbering 1,946,426; the number of deaths this week, in proportion to the same official authority, is 1406 out of the same population, showing a decrease in the mortality, this week, of 470.

The relative mortality of different districts will be seen by the following portion of the Registrar's Report:—

THE NUMBER in the METROPOLIS.—The number of births in the metropolis amount to—Males, 690; females, 629; total, 1319.

EAST INDIA HOUSE.—A General Quarterly Court of the Proprietors of East India Stock was held on Wednesday, at the Company's house in Leadenhall-street The Chairman gave notice that the half-yearly dividends on East India Stock would (unable to Act of Parliament) be paid on the 6th of January next and following days.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—The examination of candidates for the two King's scholarships, vacant by the departure of Messrs. Lucas, Mac. W. S. Bennett, Mr. J. ELLIOTT, Mr. J. Bennett. The successful candidates were Miss Dorothy Walkins and Master W. G. Cusins. The following candidates highly distinguished themselves at the examination:—Misses M. E. Smith, B. M. Street, C. Fraser; Messrs. Layland, Nicholson, Von Holst.

KING'S COLLEGE GRAMMAR SCHOOL, NORWICH.—The annual recitation by the pupils of this grammar school took place in the school-room at Mile-end, on Wednesday, when the Right Hon. Lord Sondes presided at the distribution of prizes.

ROYAL NAVAL SCHOOL, NEW CROSS.—The half-yearly distribution of prizes took place in the chapel of the establishment on Tuesday, at half-past twelve o'clock, Rear Admiral Bowles, C.B., M.P., president, in the chair.

MERCHANT SEAMEN'S SOCIETY.—On Tuesday afternoon, a Quarterly Court of the Governors and Directors of the Corporation for the Relief of Seamen in the Merchant Service, was held at the office, 25, Birchin-lane, Cornhill: G. Dawson Kerr, Esq., in the chair. The minutes of the last Court, and the cash accounts for the quarter ending 30th September, 1847, were read and approved; and the meeting proceeded in committee to consider the cases of upwards of 70 applicants. The Secretary, W. Watson, Esq., stated that, during the past year, there had been 1440 cases relieved before the committee, to whom temporary relief or permanent pensions had been granted.

ELECTION OF MR. SALOMONS AS ALDERMAN.—On Tuesday evening Mr. Salomons invited a large number of his friends to dine at the London Tavern, in commemoration of his accession to the position of Alderman of the Cordwainers' Ward. The worthy host was supported by many influential citizens, and in the course of the evening Rothschilds joined the party.

A DEPUTATION of Irish M.P.'s waited on Sir G. Grey on Friday (last week), at the Home-Office, with the view of impressing upon the Government the absolute necessity of a grant of money for the relief of the famine in those localities where the Poor-Law relief would not suffice. Sir G. Grey, in reply, assured the deputation that, acquiescing in the principle set forth by them, he was enabled to state that the Government had, as the first step, applied for the money, which, at their disposal, means sufficient for the present to meet any case of destitution likely to occur, at an early period, and which would not be provided for by local resources, provided those means were used only in cases in which the local resources of the union had been exercised to the fullest extent available, and had been found insufficient. The deputation considered the right hon. gentleman's explanation most satisfactory; and the determination of the Government calculated to prevent anything even approaching last year's distress.

THE ROYAL BOUNTY.—On Monday morning the Bishop of Oxford, Lord High Almoner, attended by the Sub-Almoner, Lord Lyttelton, and his train, attended at the Almonry Office, Whitehall, and distributed the Royal bounty to a very great number of aged and infirm persons, each recipient being presented with two half-crowns and a shilling, on producing a form of application for the bounty issued on Maunday Thursday. The recipients this year were so numerous that Tuesday also was occupied to complete the distribution.

METROPOLITAN POLICE COURTS.—The following return was circulated throughout the various divisions of the metropolitan police, relative to another very mysterious robbery, which took place the previous evening at the Paddington Railway station. Mr. Fryer, a part of whose duty it is to pay the men belonging to the locomotive department, left his office, adjacent to the entrance gates, at six o'clock, to go to tea, and, on quitting, locked, as usual, the outer door. On his return, after an absence of not more than twenty minutes, he discerned that the office had been entered, no doubt by means of a skeleton key, and that upwards of £80 in gold and silver had been stolen from a drawer, the lock of which had been forced. Information of the robbery was promptly communicated to Mr. Colard, the superintendent of the Company's police, who is using his utmost endeavours to trace out the guilty party.

HIGHWAY ROBBERY AT LIVERPOOL.—On Monday evening, a daring highway robbery was committed in the suburbs of Liverpool. Mr. John Houghton, of Mid-lana, West Derby, was proceeding, in a private cab, accompanied by his three sisters and another lady, for the purpose of attending at a celebrate institution, when they were stopped by six men, armed with a pistol, sword, &c. They had, however, only succeeded in obtaining a small sum of money from Mr. Houghton when the approach of an omnibus disturbed them, and they escaped. The robbers were supposed to be some of the dismissed "navvies."

POSTSCRIPT.

SHIPWRECKS ON THE IRISH COAST, AND LOSS OF LIFE.

During the storm on Friday night (last week) the schooner Ida, of Newry, John Bannon master, bound from Runcorn to Newry, with a cargo of rock salt, was driven into Dundrum Bay. The violence of the gale drove the hapless vessel on a sandbank opposite to Tyrella, where she capsized, and the master and a crew of five persons were drowned. The schooner has since gone to pieces, and two of the bodies have been washed ashore.

The barque Irene, of Liverpool, 360 tons burden, on her way from Benin, west coast of Africa, to Liverpool, was driven into Ballinskelligs Bay, county Kerry, at three o'clock A.M., on the 17th inst. She was laden with palm oil and ivory, and consigned to her owners, Harrison and Co., Liverpool. Sixteen of the crew, including the captain and one passenger, have been saved. The exertions of the countrypeople in saving the crew were most praiseworthy: they carried them on their backs for more than half a mile to Waterville. It is expected that a great portion of the valuable cargo will be saved.

About four o'clock on the same morning, a ship laden with deals and staves was driven ashore at Gun Point, about two miles west of Skull Harbour, and three from where the Stephen Whitney was lost, and in a few moments became a total wreck. None of the crew have been seen. Some suppose they abandoned her; others that they were drowned. Another vessel in distress also cast anchor on that morning outside Skull Harbour; but, in consequence of the violent storm then raging, no assistance could be rendered her; her fate is unknown.

On the same morning the ship Henrietta Mary, of New Ross, for Quebec, drifted ashore near Cove, 13 of her crew had been picked up by the brig Caroline, arrived there from Bristol, on the 13th inst.; the master, officer, 17 of the crew, and a lady passenger lost.

The ship Maple Leaf, of and from Quebec, bound to Bristol, fortunately got into Cove on the preceding night, with loss of sails, bulwarks, &c.

The packet-ship Oxford, which sailed from Liverpool for New York, has been compelled to put back to Cork for repairs, after being at sea twenty-three days. On the 6th, she encountered a fearful storm, and shipped a tremendous sea, which swept her deck fore and aft, and forcing itself down the hatchways, flooded the vessel between decks and drowned eight of her steerage passengers in their berths.

The Phœnix steam-ship has just arrived at Bristol, bringing a portion of the crew of the Lord Gantorbury, a timber ship from Quebec, which has also had become water-logged and unmanageable on the 8th instant, and on the 16th a vessel was hailed, and succeeded in rescuing the mate and twelve of the crew, but was unable, from the increasing violence of the gale, to get on the captain, and the rest of the crew, who originally numbered twenty men and boys.

FIRES IN THE METROPOLIS.—On Wednesday night, about ten o'clock, a fire, attended with a serious destruction of property, broke out upon the extensive premises belonging to Messrs. Alfred Bennett and Henry Morton Burton, engineers and millwrights, in Holland-street Blackfriars-road. The flames were fully obtained by half past 11 o'clock, but not before the entire roof and the turnery were completely gutted. The origin of the disaster is unknown.—On Wednesday morning, at four o'clock, a fire burst forth from the Coachmakers' Arms Tavern, Rose-street, Long-acre, the property of Mr. John Lewis, owing to the great quantity of spirits in the place, the whole was soon one sheet of fire, which, mounting the stairs, fired every room in the building almost simultaneously. Fortunately there was a good supply of water, which was scattered into the midst of the fire, and, after the lapse of two hours, the flames were extinguished. The total damage is very considerable, but Mr. Dunston was insured.

IRELAND.

THE illness of the Lord Chancellor continues to present a very dangerous aspect. But little hope is entertained of the right honourable gentleman's recovery.

KILKENNY ELECTION.—On Saturday Michael Sullivan, Esq., was unanimously elected as representative for the City of Kilkenny, in the room of John O'Connell, Esq.

THE Lord Lieutenant has approved of Lord Courtown being appointed a Deputy Lieutenant of the county of Wexford

LAW APPOINTMENTS.—The Chairmanship of Louth, vacated by the well-merited appointment of Mr. Henry Baldwin to the responsible post of law adviser to the Castle, has been conferred on Mr. P. Plake, of the Connaught Circuit. The learned gentleman is a Whig and a Roman Catholic, and his professional attainments are but little inferior to those of his learned brother, the late James Henry Blake, the eminent Queen's Counsel.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—This body met on Monday, as usual. There was rather a crowded attendance. Amongst those present were Mr. Maurice O'Connell, M.P., Mr. John O'Neil, M.P., Alderman O'Brien, &c. &c. The rent was announced to be £1!

THE CLARENCE SYSTEM.—From the reported proceedings had at the last meeting of the Galway Board of Poor Law Guardians, it appears that a system of depopulating large tracts of land, and throwing the pauperised inhabitants for support upon the electoral divisions, prevails to an extent unknown in that county. To remedy this act of injustice, by which certain proprietors are made to shift the charge of those whose paupers from their own shoulders to those of the overtaxed ratepayers, a resolution was carried, stating the opinion of the Guardians, that the only way of preventing the evil is to resort to a townland rating, for the support of paupers chargeable to them, and by making protest the resident proprietors and occupiers who do their duty to their tenants, by making it the interest of every proprietor to employ the labouring population on their property; and they call on the Commissioners for the Relief of the Poor in Ireland to impress on the Government the equity and necessity of having the present law, as regards the rating, changed from electoral divisions to a townland rating, and thereby protect the interests of ratepayers, by compelling proprietors to keep the poor, or otherwise all will be reduced to the same level of poverty and pauperism

THE MURDER OF THE REV. MR. LLOYD.—A correspondent of the Evening Mail, writing under date Roscommon, December 18, says:—"Yesterday evening (last week) about five o'clock, a party of the constabulary, with Sub-Inspector Young, and an officer and party of the 68th Regiment, all under the command of Mr. Edmond Drake, resident magistrate, arrived at Boyounagh, from Elphin, with twelve persons in custody, who have been fully committed, and lodged in the county gaol, two of whom are charged as being the perpetrators of the murder of the late Rev. John Lloyd, of Smith-hall, near Elphin, and ten as being parties to the conspiracy to murder that lamented gentleman."

The Colonelcy of the 4th Light Dragoons, vacant by the demise of Sir Charles Dalbac, has been filled up by the appointment of Major-General Sir George Scovell, from the 7th Dragoon Guards. The latter regiment has been given to Major-General Murray.

CHLOROFORM.—Dr. Reymonet, chief surgeon of the Hôtel Dieu, at Marseilles succeeded, last week, in amputating the arm from the socket of a woman, aged fifty, when under the influence of chloroform. The woman, being agitated, was not at first affected by the inhalation, but, on a second application, became insensible in about two minutes, and remained so until the painful operation was completed. She was throughout in a calm sleep, and, on awakening, declared that she had felt no pain.

REFUSAL TO BE A MAGISTRATE.—On the recommendation of C. H. Leigh, Esq., Lord-Lieutenant of Monmouth, the Lord-Chancellor was pleased to add the name of C. Conway, Esq., of Pontewydd, to the commission of the peace for that county. The honour, however, has been declined by that gentleman, on religious grounds, because, as a dissenter, he believes that a legalised establishment for the support of religion is a great moral and social wrong, but that, if he accepted the magisterial office, he should be compelled to put in force laws for the support of that of which he entertained this opinion.

THE REV. JOHN E. NEWMAN was to leave Rome on the 9th instant, for England. Mr. Newman is the bearer of documents of great importance relative to the re-arrangement of the Roman Catholic diocese, and the establishment of new bishoprics. He is expected in England in a few days.

CHRISTMAS BOXES.—The grocers of Ledbury and Hayo have, like those of Hereford and Leominster, resolved to discontinue the custom of giving Christmas-boxes, and to present the amount to the public charities.

A ROYAL ordonnance, dated the 19th, opens a supplementary credit of 800,000f. to the French Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, to enable him to continue to pay premiums as encouragement to the whale and cod fisheries, the sum of 4,000,000f. allowed in the last budget having been found insufficient.

MORE RAILWAY ROBBERIES.—Another robbery of cash at the Great Western Station makes the third mysterious loss of cash which that Company has sustained, besides two other robberies of cash at the Folkstone Station of the South-Eastern Railway, and the Bristol Station of the Bristol and Gloucester Company. On this day (Monday) yet been obtained.

A FIRE-DAMP explosion occurred on Saturday last at one of the pits of the Bowling Company, at East Bierley, Yorkshire, whereby eleven men and three boys were all more or less severely scorched. One of the sufferers, a youth named Barrett, has since died. An inquest was held on Tuesday at the Hand and Shuttle Inn, Bowling, before Mr. C. Jewison, and a verdict of "Accidental Death" returned. The accident arose from one of the men suffering a hole to remain in the ganze of his "Davy's lamp."

HORRIBLE MURDER.—Mr. Copeman, jun., son of Mr. Copeman, farmer, of Blyborough, was found on Sunday morning last, about nine o'clock, on the road leading from Kirton to Blyborough, quite dead. His throat was cut, and the body was otherwise dreadfully mangled; a piece of flesh was knocked or cut off his face, and was lying on the ground near the body. One of the sufferers, a youth named Barrett, has since died. An inquest was held on Tuesday at the Hand and Shuttle Inn, Bowling, before Mr. C. Jewison, and a verdict of "Accidental Death" returned. The accident arose from one of the men suffering a hole to remain in the ganze of his "Davy's lamp."

HORRIBLE MURDER.—Mr. Copeman, jun., son of Mr. Copeman, farmer, of Blyborough, was found on Sunday morning last, about nine o'clock, on the road leading from Kirton to Blyborough, quite dead. His throat was cut, and the body was otherwise dreadfully mangled; a piece of flesh was knocked or cut off his face, and was lying on the ground near the body. The young man had a dog with him, which had also been very much cut and bruised, but it was not quite killed. Mr. Copeman left the Red Lion Inn, Kirton, about twelve o'clock on Saturday night, to go home to Blyborough, and it appears that he had not gone far before he met with his assassins.

DREADFUL WRECKS AND LOSS OF LIFE. Intelligence has been communicated at Lloyd's of the deplorable loss of a fine ship, called the Henrietta Maria (of 400 tons burden) between Liverpool and Quebec), within 100 miles of the English coast, and the perishing of fourteen lives, including the captain, chief officers, and a lady passenger. The unfortunate vessel was reported to be in distress.—Accounts were also on Monday received of a fearful collision near the entrance of the English Channel, on the night of the 14th inst., between the Warrior, Bayton, master, from London to Gibraltar, and the Emma, Berths, commander, reported to be from the Black Sea. Of the two, the Emma suffered the most, and she quickly went down, with five of her crew, who of course perished. The remainder succeed d in reaching the Warrior, which, in a crippled state, run into Falmouth to make good her injury. The authorities are now investigating the matter.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH, GUILDHALL.

SALE OF CADETSHIPS.—THE QUEEN v. CAPTAIN CHARRITIE, SIR W. YOUNG, ANNA STEWART, AND RALLETT.—This was an indictment against the defendants, in which they were charged, under the Act 49th Geo. III., c. 126, sec. 3, with the offence of having committed and misapplied and disposed of a cadetship in the East India Company's Service for a pecuniary reward or consideration. The case excited a great deal of interest from the respectable position of the parties implicated. Sir W. Young and Captain Charritie, late officers of the East India Company, and Captain Charritie being a person moving in the most respectable society. The trial engaged the Court the whole of Saturday and Monday last. The first count charged John Charritie, James Rallett, and Anna, widow of Alex Stewart, on the 1st day of November, in the 8th year of the present reign, with having unlawfully and corruptly received from one William Wotherspoon the sum of £2000, for the appointment and nomination of one William White Wotherspoon to the office of a cadet in the service of the East India Company, against the form of the statue, &c.; and Sir William Young, Bart., with having from the same motives contained to the same, and also gave to her, as she was about to leave Edinburgh for London, a draft on Jones Loyd and Co., for £1080. As, however, he expressed a desire to be in some way satisfied that the negotiation would proceed, he very shortly afterwards sent a letter containing another letter, in these words:—"My dear Charritie,—I shall have much pleasure in giving an appointment to your young friend, William White Wotherspoon, in November next. Yours, W. Young." The letter was duly cashed, in the following notes:—One of £500, one of £300, two of £100, five of £10, five of £5, and £3 1s. 1d. in cash, the discount being equal to the difference. The possession of these notes was traced to some of the defendants. Rallett paid a sum of £70 to Trotter for the introduction to Charritie, and the larger portion was received by Charritie himself. The nomination was made in January, 1844, and it then became necessary to complete the appointment by executing certain papers which, in a prescribed form, and along with other matters, contained a solemn declaration by the persons applying for, receiving, and giving an appointment, that they did not give or receive any actual or future pecuniary consideration for it. At that time, Mr. Wotherspoon knew nothing of Sir William Young, but, nevertheless, his son's petition for the appointment stated that he had been nominated by Sir William Young, at the recommendation of the petitioner's father. The next paper was the actual nomination, which stated that Sir William Young presented the young man in consideration of his nomination for the season, and added, "I declare from the character I have received of him from his father, who certifies that he is well acquainted with his character, family, and connexions," that he is fit to be recommended for an appointment. Then came a paper, with questions by the young man himself, which stated that his father recommended him, and a declaration by Sir William Young that he believed all the statements in the several papers to be correct. The next paper was a certificate of the young man's birth, which was sent to Edinburgh to be filled up. It was returned, and with it the required declaration, signed by Wotherspoon, that the nomination was for private virtual or reward. The son was appointed to the Madras army, and left for India in December, 1844. In the course of the year 1846 some investigations affecting Rallett took place, and ultimately a secret committee of Directors of the East India Company, of which Sir J. Hogg was chairman, was appointed to investigate the affair, the result of which was the present prosecution. The above state of facts having been proved in evidence, the Judge summed up, and after a short deliberation, returned against Captain Charritie a genera. verdict of "Guilty;" and against Sir W. Young a verdict of "Guilty" on the second count only, that charging a conspiracy to obtain the appointment.

TRIMEN v. LORD CURZON RAILWAY LIABILITIES.—On Tuesday, the plaintiff in this case sought to recover the sum of £1000, being the balance, after giving credit for £800 already paid, of a sum of £2000 claimed by him for work and labour as a surveyor, in preparing the maps plans, and sections of the Oxford, Thame, High Wycombe, and Uxbridge Junction Railway Company. The evidence showed that the plaintiff had been appointed to the office at a meeting of the Provisional Committee, held on the 8th of October, 1845, and the minutes of which were afterwards confirmed at a meeting of the 20th of October, at which the defendant was present.—It was the only meeting of the Committee at which the defendant was ever present—and that other steps in the management of the scheme, which were of a very important nature such as extending the prospectus, increasing the original capital by a sum of £100,000, &c., &c. were taken without the defendant's sanction. Lord Denman left it to the Jury to say whether there had been any contract by the defendant to repay the plaintiff, and if so, whether the plaintiff had received as much as he was entitled to.—The Jury, after brief deliberation, returned a verdict for the defendant.

SECONDARIES' COURT.

PETO AND ANOTHER v. THE BIRMINGHAM AND OXFORD JUNCTION RAILWAY COMPANY.—On Wednesday, an action, brought by Messrs. Peto and Co., the railway contractors, to recover the sum of £21,000, for work and labour done for the Birmingham and Oxford Junction Railway Company, was tried. The action was brought on a guarantee given by the Company to the chief engineer, to indemnify him against liability incurred by plaintiffs in the course of the works should he paid to them fortnightly, but there was an arrear for one month to the above amount. A Judge's order had been obtained, on which defendants admitted their liability, and that the engineer, Mr. Brunell, had duly certified that the works had been done.—The Jury gave a verdict for the full amount claimed.

POLICE.

WESTMINSTER.

THREATENING TO SHOOT LORD G. BENTINCK.—Henry Watson, a middle-aged man, having the appearance of a decayed tradesman, was, on Saturday last, charged before Mr. Burrell with threatening to shoot Lord George Bentinck. It appeared that, about half-past seven o'clock on the previous evening, policeman Lockyer, A 96, seeing the prisoner standing near the Members' entrance to the House of Commons, entered into conversation with him, when the prisoner offered him half-a-crown to allow him Lord George Bentinck when he arrived, and on pressing him why he wished to know, he admitted that he wanted to shoot him. He was then taken into custody, when he said he could not help it, for Lord George was opposing Lord John Russell's measures, and that he had for two or three days past waited about the Park to tell the Queen about it, but she was out of town. Other evidence was also gone into to prove that the prisoner had on the previous evening (Thursday) evening, while lying about in Harrow-road, Paddington, said he was going to shoot Lord George Bentinck, and pulled out a bullet from his waistcoat pocket.—Mr. Burrell said he thought the matter one of a very serious character, and committed the prisoner to find himself in £200, and two sureties in £100 each. The worthy magistrate subsequently directed the clerk to make the commitment with his impression that the prisoner was insane.

MARYLEBONE.

On Monday, Mr. Charles Coghlin, a sporting gentleman, attended before Mr. Broughton, by virtue of a warrant, obtained against him on Thursday last, charging him with having sent a hostile message, through Mr. Dillon Browne, to M. F. de Mayo, to Mr. Alfred G. Prescott, brother-in-law to Lord Rendlesham, and late a Lieutenant in the Queen's Bays. The dispute arose about a turf transaction. Mr. Prescott's solicitor read a letter, in which Mr. Coghlin declared, that, if Mr. Prescott did not arrange matters with him by a certain day, he must treat him as a body. Coghlin admitted that, on his hearing of this outrage, he requested his friend, Mr. Dillon Browne, to wait upon Mr. Prescott to demand an explanation of such conduct. Mr. Browne accordingly saw him, when it was agreed that Mr. Prescott should send a letter to Mr. Browne that day, at five o'clock, to the Reform Club. Other particulars were gone into, and much warmth of feeling was displayed on either side.—The defendant said that he had no hostile intentions towards Mr. Prescott, and that he should take no notice whatever of him in future.—Upon this assurance the warrant was dismissed, and the parties then left the Court.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.—The adjourned December Sessions commenced on Tuesday morning at the Sessions House, Clerkenwell, with a list of 88 prisoners for trial; of that number 82 were indicted for felony. 51 were described as being imperfect y instructed in reading and writing, 35 were ignorant of both, and two only were stated to be able to read and write well.

ON Saturday last, as one of the forenoon trains of the Edinburgh and Northern Railway was on the point of starting from the village of Kettle, a guard named Munro, while either in the act of ascending or descending from the carriage, missed his footing, and fell under the train, which passed over his body. The unfortunate man was instantly killed, his limbs being dreadfully lacerated and bruised by the accident.

RAILWAY INTELLIGENCE.

COMPARATIVE RATE OF SPEED ON RAILWAYS. The principal railway companies have fixed the accelerated speed at which the trains will run during the winter quarter, at the following comparative rates: Express trains on the Great Western travel at the rate of 48 miles an hour; North Western, 38; South Eastern, 35; Brighton Coast, 35; Eastern Counties, 29; and South Western, 29. First and second class trains: Great Western, 32; North and South Western, 26; South Eastern and Brighton Coast, 23; and Eastern Counties, 24. Third class, or parliamentary trains: Great and North Western, 16; Brighton Coast and South Eastern, 18; South Western, 24; and Eastern Counties, 14. Mail trains travel at the same rate as first and second-class trains

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Farewell! a word that has been, and must be,
Yet not the less a pain. . . . . BYRON

There is a natural regret that attends doing anything for the last time; the conviction carries a moral with it which none can canvass without, at least, grave earnestness.

Partings form a lesson hard to learn:
Ever unions feel this when they go to war.
There is a sort of unwilling concern,
A kind of shock, that sets one's heart ajar;
At leaving even the most unpleasant people
And places, one keeps looking at the steeple

We shall speak no more of the boon recreations of Old England in 1847. They will soon have passed, with many things that we can better spare, into the mighty maelstrom of time. Perhaps that recollection alone disposes us to look back in a spirit that arrays them with far brighter tints than they wore when present—the sunset glories which memory is wont to shed over departed days. Still, the year on whose knots we stand was rife with many a passage of good pastime, well fitted to the character of the land we live in, and whose olden customs are worthy of their modern instances. It bore testimony to the progress of a better taste in our National Sports—keeping pace with the general social improvement. The defilements of coarseness and cruelty continue fast to disappear from our popular amusements.

It is unnecessary here to catalogue those sports once so common among all classes in this country, which were calculated to minister to a depraved excitement and to generate ungentle feelings. Many—indeed most of them—have ceased to be practised altogether: and, though we are no advocates of the milk and water system of manly occupations and diversions, we shrink from the contemplation of human nature rioting in the gory drunkenness of contests between brutes and hired gladiators still more brutal. We would have this a nation of men, but that is no reason it should not be a nation of gentlemen.

For-hunting, that was to be blown clean from our fields by steam, still goes on and prospers. Railway conveyance has done at least as much for as against it. Those who have "cash and sense," wherever the climates or occasions of life may have distributed them, can now take their pastime in pleasant places. The dwellers amidst the hills of Cumberland or the vales of Stafford, may meet the Quorn or the Pytchley, and finish the day by their own firesides. And they do so—and those who formerly saw a good country for one week in the season, now have only themselves to blame, if they follow the chase like the wild huntsmen in Der Freyschütz—or to the bottom of a coal-pit. We spoke of the prospects of the turf last week—they are "great, glorious, and golden." The position of all our recreative rural resources is equally satisfactory. The Game-Laws have lost much of their offensive operation—and the spirit of conciliation is divided equally between the game preserver and the game protector. Peace that reigns over our political policy is the bond of union for the landed proprietor and the land cultivator. Boon feelings are abroad—boon prospects and boon promises. Thus the season of '47 closes—may the course of its successor be cause for similar congratulation.

TATTERSALL'S

MONDAY.—A better attendance than we have had for some time past, but no improvement in business. The only bets were 100 even on the field against Chandler and the Glaucus gelding for the Wakefield Steeple Chase, 20 to 1 each against Sir Arthur and Lord Exeter for the Liverpool event, 1000 to 30 against Kelesho for the Chester Cup, 5 to 1 against Surplice for the 2000 Guineas Stakes, and 1100 to 300 against Scott's lot, and 40 to 1 each against Rosslyn and The Fowler for the Derby.

On Thursday the room was almost deserted, and the business was altogether unworthy of notice.

FINE ARTS.

LAUNCE'S LECTURE. Painted by T. F. DICKSEE. Lithographed by J. R. DICKSEE. Ackermann.

This is a very cleverly-executed litho-print of Mr. Dicksee's picture, exhibited last season at the Gallery of the Society of British Artists. It was, certainly, one of the most characteristic paintings in the Exhibition, and attracted much attention. We are sure, therefore, anxious to find it selected for publication in this reasonable form. It is a very faithful transcript of the picture; the expression of Launce being admirably portrayed; and that of the dog is equally skilful. Altogether, this is an excellent illustration of Shakspearean humour, and deserves to become popular.

OLD CHRISTMAS.

DRAWN BY WILLIAM HARVEY.

I like them well—the curious prelseness
And all-pretended gravity of those
That seek to banish hence these harmless sports,
Have thrust away much ancient honesty Old Poet.

RIGHTLY to appreciate the spirited composition of the tableau upon the preceding page, the reader must carry his mind's eye back to the picturesque celebration of Christmas, such as we find it sung in an Anglo-Norman carol of the thirteenth century:—

Now, Lordlings, listen to our ditty,
Strangers coming from afar;
Let poor Misfortune move your pity,
Give us welcome, soothe our care.
In this mansion, as they tell us,
Christmas wassail keeps to-day;
And, as the King of all good fellows,
Reigns with uncontrolled sway.

Lordlings, in these realms of pleasure
Father Christmas yearly dwells,
Deals out joy with liberal measure,
Gloomy sorrow soon dispels:
Numerous guests, and viands dainty,
Fill the hall and grace the board
Mirth and beauty, peace and plenty,
Solid pleasures here afford.

The scene is the carved screen of a baronial hall. Upon the central compartment hang the helmet, surcoat, and shield, of the period—the insignia of a physical triumph, encircled with holly and evergreens, the emblems of the victory gained over the powers of darkness by the coming of Christ." This group is flanked with the weapons of war and the chase—the trusty sword and spear, the twanging bow and echoing horn—in trophied boast of the heroism of the lord.

High above the screen rises a triple window, richly dight,

Casting a dim religious light.

In the triptic are pictured three of the great events of our Saviour's life: in the centre, lies the heaven-born child

All meanly wrapt;

and in the side compartments, are shadowed forth the baptism and the transfiguration. These pictures from "the divine checkerwork" of the story of our religion are the characteristic glorification of the Holy Season by the hand of art.

The eye descends now to the commemoration in a more secular sense. From the altar of plenty, the lord and his family are ministering to the wants of the lame, the halt, and the poor in this world's goods:—

Lordlings, 'tis said the liberal mind,
That on the needy much bestows,
From Heaven's sure reward shall find;
From Heaven, whence every blessing flows.
Who largely gives with willing hand,
Or quickly gives with willing heart;
His fame shall spread throughout the land,
His memory thence shall ne'er depart!

Upon the opposite side is the coming into the hall of the Hobby-horse, with minstrelsy of pipe and tabor; in full-blown grotesque pride,

We are come o'er the Mire and Moss;
We dance an Hobby-horse."

Upon the face of the altar is the welcoming of the Yule Clog, with sound of trumpet:

Come, bring with a noise,
My merrie, merrie boyes
The Christmas Log to the firing;
While yule doth last, and blaze fast,
Bids ye all be free,
And drink to your heart's desiring.

Upon the altar are grouped the kindly fruit and costly flagon, to gladden the hearts of all comers: here, too, is the Wassail Bowl, spiced to the brink:

Next crowns the bowle full
With gentle Lamb's Wooll,
And sugar, nutmeg, and ginger;
With store of ale too;
And thus ye must doe
To make the Wassaile a swinger.

At the foot of the altar lie the animals killed in the chase; and forming an effective foreground to this impressive picture of OLDEN CHRISTMAS.

OLD CHRISTMAS.—DRAWN BY WILLIAM HARVEY

"MERRY CHRISTMAS"—DRAWN BY KENNY MEADOWS.

CHRISTMAS COMES BUT ONCE A YEAR.

BY THOMAS MILLER

Old Christmas is come for to keep open house,
And scorns to be guilty of starving a mouse:
Then come, boys, and welcome, for dat the chief,
There's plum-pudding, roast goose, minced pies, and roast beef.
Then let us be merry, and taste the good cheer,
And remember Old Christmas but comes once a year.

Old Christmas Carol.

THOSE Christmas bells as sweetly chime,
As on the day when first they rung
So merrily in the olden time,
And far and wide their music flung:
Shaking the tall grey ivied tower,
With all their deep melodious power.
They still proclaim to every ear,
Old Christmas comes but once a year.

Then he came singing through the woods,
And plucked the holly bright and green;
Pulled here and there the ivy buds;
Was sometimes hidden, sometimes seen—
Half buried 'neath the mistletoe,
His long beard hung with flakes of snow;
And still he ever carolled clear,
Old Christmas comes but once a year.

He merrily came in days of old
When roads were few, and ways were foul,
Now staggered,—now some ditty trolled,
Now drank deep from his wassail bowl;
His holly silvered o'er with frost,
Nor never once his way he lost,
For reeling here, and reeling there,
Old Christmas came but once a year.

The hall was then with holly crowned,
'Twas on the wild-deer's antlers placed;
It hemmed the battered armour round,
And every ancient trophy graced.
It decked the boar's head, tusked and grim,
The wassail-bowl wreathed to the brim.
A summer-green hung every where,
For Christmas came but once a year.

His jaded steed the armed Knight
Reined up before the Abbey gate;
By all assisted to alight,
From humble monk to abbot great.
They placed his lance behind the door,
His armour on the rush-strewn floor;
And then brought out the best of cheer,
For Christmas came but once a year.

The maiden then, in quaint attire,
Loosed from her head the silken hood,
And danced before the yule-clog fire—
The crackling monarch of the wood.
Helmet and shield flashed back the blaze,
In lines of light, like summer rays,
While music sounded loud and clear;
For Christmas came but once a year.

What, though upon his hoary head,
Have fallen many a winter's snow,
His wreath is still as green and red
As 'twas a thousand years ago.
For what has he to do with care?
His wassail-bowl and old arm-chair
Are ever standing ready there,
For Christmas comes but once a year.

No marvel Christmas lives so long,
He never knew but merry hours,
His nights were spent with mirth and song,
In happy homes, and princely bowers;
Was greeted both by serf and lord,
And seated at the festal board;
While every voice cried "welcome here,"
Old Christmas comes but once a year.

But what care we for days of old,
The Knights whose arms have turned to rust,
Their grim boar's heads and pasties cold,
Their castles crumbled into dust?
Never did sweeter faces go,
Blushing beneath the mistletoe,
Than are to-night assembled here,
For Christmas still comes once a year.

For those old times are dead and gone,
And those who hailed them past away,
Yet still there lingers many a one,
To welcome in old Christmas Day.
The poor will many a care forget,
The debtor think not of his debt;
But, as they each enjoy their cheer,
Wish it was Christmas all the year.

And still around these good old times
We hang like friends full loth to part,
We listen to the simple rhymes
Which somehow sink into the heart.
"Half musical, half melancholy,"
Like childish smiles that still are holy,
A masquer's face dimmed with a tear,
For Christmas comes but once a year.

The bells which usher in that morn,
Have ever drawn my mind away
To Bethlehem, where Christ was born,
And the low stable where He lay,
In which the large-eyed oxen fed;
To Mary bowing low her head,
And looking down with love sincere,
Such thoughts brings Christmas once a year.

At early day the youthful voice
Heard singing on from door to door,
Makes the responding heart rejoice,
To know the children of the poor
For once are happy all day long;
We smile and listen to the song,
The burthen still remote or near,
"Old Christmas comes but once a year,"

Upon a gayer, happier scene,
Never did holly-berries peer,
Or ivy throw its trailing green,
On brighter forms than there are here,
Nor Christmas in his old age
Smile upon lips and brows more fair,
Then let us sing amid our cheer,
Old Christmas still comes once a year.

THE THREE DENOMINATIONS.—A meeting of the deputed of the "Three Denominations" (Independents, Presbyterians, and Baptists) was held on Monday afternoon, at the King's Head, in the Poultry, at which a new election of representatives took place. The Secretary read the report of the Committee for the past year, in which a description was given of their exertions in opposition to the Government scheme of education, and the endowment of the Irish priesthood. The results of the Committee's proceedings was, that there were at present not less than sixty-two members in Parliament who were opposed to all grants of public money for religious endowments. The report was adopted, and petitions to both Houses of Parliament were agreed to, praying for the removal of the civil disabilities of the Jews. It was also resolved that the case of John Simonds, now confined for non-payment of fivepence church rates, be referred to the Committee, to take such steps as they might be advised.

LITERATURE.

NOW AND THEN. By SAMUEL WARREN, F.R.S. Blackwood.

We have received a copy of this work, but only in time to do little more than glance at its pages, and detach a few specimen extracts, in time for our present Number. It will be seen that two of these passages are very appropriate to the season, indeed, the work may be received as a "Christmas Book" of the first class. The main interest of the story turns upon the sen of a decayed old villager (Aylife) being tried for murder, and saved by the intercession of the vicar of the parish (Mr. Hylton). Our extracts will convey some idea of the high, religious, and moral tone of the work, as well as of the power and perspicuity evinced by the author in detailing his incidents. The last quoted extract is a remarkable instance of this great command in conducting a narrative.

HOLY CHRISTMAS.

"All hail, thou season of rightful, but solemn and elevating joy! Oh, wi ot EVENT, gracious, stupendous, and awful, cost thou not commemorate! What but the mysterious—yet foretold—advent of the Almighty Redeemer of mankind, the joy and glory of heaven and earth! In the wrapt, contemplative, humbled mood dry dust of earth become initiate with heavenly intelligence: even as the stars sang together for joy! Lo! a universal HOSANNAH fill the hearts and voices of mankind. For He came! and was God WITH US; God clothed in the flesh! WITH US! HERE! on this dim speck, amidst the bewildering and inconceivable vastness of the universe, singled out for such purpose in the unsearchable wisdom of the Most High! Angels unseen! how with us your present dust-clad brethren your heads in awe profound! Together let us celebrate this Mystery, saying, 'Glory to God in the highest; and on earth PEACE, GOOD-WILL TOWARDS MEN!' Thus, heaven-kindled, is the joyousness of Christmas: soul-elevating: heart-opening. Therefore do all Christian people welcome this solemnly cheerful season: their hearts being first prostrate before God, and then expanding towards man, in deeds of charity and virtue.

"But the coming of this hallowed season cannot, alas! banish gloom, poverty, and wretchedness, —no, not even for one day— from among mankind. The great and the humble, the distinguished and the obscure, the rich and the poor, the gifted and the simple, may alike have their happy or their miserable Christmas Be the season, therefore, approached with mingled fear and hope; and, when past, regarded with pious reflection, with reverential gratitude, and cheerful anticipation."

CHRISTMAS IN THE CASTLE AND THE COTTAGE.

"There were, indeed, as old Aylife had supposed, grand rejoicings at the Castle that Christmas, to celebrate the first anniversary of the birth-day of the future heir to the Castle; and many distinguished visitors had been invited, whose equipages had thundered at intervals past old Aylife's cottage for a day or two before that on which Lord Aikmond had passed, as has been described, he having been detained in town by military business, rendered necessary by his having obtained a somewhat extended leave of absence.

"It was decreed by the Castle authorities that no one should be admitted to the Castle [illegible] order had gone forth for corresponding festivities and holiday-making among the villagers and the surrounding tenantry; for all of which Lord Milver stoke had most bountifully provided, after the usual fashion of old English hospitality, on a great scale. His frigid courtesy was, on that occasion, melted into cheerful cordiality. Except during a brief interval of high office, and of great political power, his ambitious and craving soul had never appeared so nearly satisfied. The dignitaries of the Castle reaped a rich harvest; the pecuniary remembrances of the season being doubled, from the highest to the lowest, by the Earl's express direction. Alas, even half of the sum paid to the humblest helper in the stables would have provided a substantial repast on Christmas-day for the melancholy occupants of the cottage; but no one in that magnificent structure ever thought of them. Had it not been for the kindness of Mr. Hylton, who had forwarded to them some little contribution towards a Christmas dinner, scarcely more than a nominal one would have been their's! Cheerless and disconsolate though Christmas threatened to be with old Aylife, as far as this world's hopes and happiness were concerned; he rose very early in the morning, while even yet the stars were glittering brightly in the cold clear sky, and all was solemn silence. What pure and elevating thoughts were his, whose spirit dropped for a while the fetters of earth, while mounting into heavenly contemplation! The old man was the only one from the cottage who made his appearance at church that day, and the vigilant eye of Mr. Hylton could scarce detect his distant figure, but as it was in the novel crowd of gentle and simple, from the Castle, that occupied the church. When he returned home, he found his son and daughter far more despondent even than he had left them. The former seemed scarcely capable of speaking in answer to either his or his father; who attributed the main cause of his depression and taciturnity, to grief at losing the situation which Mr. Hylton had been striving to obtain for him. All three of them now gave it up in despair, but none of them knew of another effort on the behalf of young Aylife which had been made by the indefatigable Mr. Hylton on his visit to his friend, and which was likely to be successful, viz., to obtain for him the situation, then vacant, of pulpit to a wealthy congregation in the clergyman who had determined to appoint young Aylife to the mastership of the school. Here Mr. Hylton was sanguine of success; and he had good grounds for expecting, within a few days' time, to be able to announce to that unhappy little family as well as to the whole cottage that all like life from the dead. Only one visitor had the Aylifes on that dreary Christmas-day, and it was Mr. Hylton, who went to them after the morning service. The snow lay nearly a foot deep, and continued to flutter down thickly, threatening to do so for hours. He carried with him a bottle of port wine, which he gave to them with a solemn and hearty benediction; at the same time placing a fire-stilling piece in the trembling hand of old Aylife, as a Christmas-box for the little Adam. There was not much fire on the hearth, and they were just concluding the meal for which they had been indebted to Mr. Hylton as he entered. They all looked so sad—even old Aylife—that Mr. Hylton longed to announce the strong hopes which he entertained that better days were, through his efforts, in store for them, but, after balancing the matter for some little time in his mind, humane prudence prevailed and he left them to spend the rest of his own sung Christmas fire-side, partaking of those homely comforts awaiting him, with a sense of quiet enjoyment, which was somewhat dashed, however, by a recollection of the cheerless scene which he had shortly before quitted. The first glass of wine which he took after dinner accompanied the following expression of his benevolent feelings:—'May God Almighty bless all mankind, and especially the virtuous poor, wherever they may be scattered.' Let the health of all my parishioners, peer and peasant, in castle and cottage -all this day duly remembering who it was that lay in the manger, and why. And may God bless thee, my Mary,' said he, embracing his wife; 'and Adam, our little one —thou last lamb of our flock,' he added, folding his little child in his arms, and kissing her, as did the mother, in silence. Their hearts were full and their eyes unconsciously glanced at several chairs ranged at the farther end of the room, which had no longer any stated occupants. Presently, however, they [illegible] a more cheerful vein, which was interrupted for a moment only when, in talking over their neighbours and parishioners, and the events of the past year, they spoke of the unfortunate Aylifes."

THE SUSPECTED MURDERER

"'Put the prisoner to the bar,' said the officer of the Court to the gaoler; and there was instantly a solemn silence, broken presently by the clanking sound of irons; and, amidst beating hearts, hurried breathing, and eyes intently fixed on the dock, there slowly approached it, accompanied by two gaolers, and walking not without difficulty in his heavy irons, a tall, marvellously well-proportioned man, apparently about thirty years old, with a countenance that, especially irradiated just then by a transient gleam of sunshine, did not at all present that it could never be that of a MURDERER. All were struck by it. 'Twas a frank manly face, of a dauntless English cast, yet looked somewhat emaciated from illness and confinement. But for that, there was not among the great or simple who beheld him, a finer specimen of the Saxon countenance, including even the colour and disposition of his hair, somewhat disordered though it seemed. He stood straight up at the bar, with an air of manly and conscious confidence; having bowed respectfully to the Judge, who was watching him with searching scrutiny. Aylife's pale face had reddened a little as he first encountered so exciting a scene, as an occasion to him so unspeakably vital and momentous. His light blue eyes spoke eloquently in his favour, being full of intelligence and spirit, and indicative of goodness; but there was much of suffering in them. As the Judge gazed at him, this favourable impression was deepening, but was effaced in a moment by habitual caution, and a recollection of what he had read concerning the case, in the depositions.'

THE KING AND HIS MINISTER

"Impelled by an irresistible impulse, and fortified by an unwavering conviction of the prisoner's innocence, Mr. Hylton, on the Friday evening, as a last resource, had, relying on the King's well-known utility in dependent character, written a letter to his Majesty, under cover to a nobleman then in London attending Parliament, and with whom Mr. Hylton had been acquainted at College. He earnestly entreated his Lordship to lose not a moment in securing a personal interview with the King, or, at all events, on delivery into his Majesty's hands of the letter in question, touching as it did life and death; its object being to save from execution, on the Monday morning, a man who was, in the writer's opinion, as innocent of the death of which he had, nevertheless, been found guilty, as the Secretary of State himself, to whom application on behalf of the convict had been unhappily made in vain. Mr. Hylton's letter to the King was expressed in terms of great eloquence. It set forth the calling in Majesty's attention to the execution, six months before, of a man, for a crime of which, three days afterwards, he was demonstrated to have been innocent. Then the letter gave a moving picture of the exemplary life and character of the prisoner, and of his father; pointed to testimonials given in his favour at the trial, and added the writer's own, together with the most emphatic and strong conviction which could be expressed in language, that, whoever might have been the perpetrator of this most atrocious murder, it was not the prisoner doomed to die on Monday. If then conjured his Majesty, by every consideration which could properly have weight with a Sovereign intrusted with authority by Almighty God to govern according to justice and mercy, to give his personal attention to the case then laid before him, and act therein according to his Majesty's own Royal and clement judgment. This letter Mr. Hylton's noble acquaintance travelled many miles, at great inconvenience, to lay before the King; who did not receive it till past midnight, at St. James's, but after he had been for upwards of an hour. On hearing, however, from the nobleman who brought the letter, that it was one of a very urgent nature, concerning life and death, those who were entrusted with guarding the Royal repose, caused it to be broken by the delivery of the packet. His Majesty instantly got out of bed, and, after hastily glancing over the letter, directed Lord Farnborough to be sent for forthwith, and to bring along with him all the papers he had or could lay his hand on, relating to Adam Aylife, then lying under sentence of death for the murder of Lord Aikmond. His Majesty had passed his chamber many times, very impatiently, before his astonished Minister arrived: for the latter had had to go from his private residence, where he also was in bed, to his office, in order to get the documents required by the King, and had experienced great difficulty in finding them; all clerks and others being, as might well be supposed, out of the way. Immediately on his entering the King's ante-chamber, Lord Farnborough encountered his Majesty, who, in a blunt way, begged him to be seated at a table duly furnished with lights and writing materials; and then the King requested to hear the whole facts of the case, to which he paid great attention. When Lord Farnborough had, in his usual terse and emphatic fashion, put his Majesty in possession of his, Lord Farnborough's, view of the case, assuring his Majesty, with expressions of profound respect, that a clearer case for hanging there never had been, if sanctioned by the highest authority in the country; his Lordship appeared confounded when the King said, very thoughtfully, that he was by no means so clear on the subject as seemed his Lordship, and, in fact, felt so uneasy on the subject, being one of life and death, that he could not return to bed without deciding one way or the other. Lord Farnborough assured the King that he need feel no anxiety whatever on a matter which was exclusively within the province of his Ministers

"'Why, look you, my Lord Farnborough,' quoth the King, somewhat hastily and sternly, 'suppose you and I differ on this matter?'

"'Please your Majesty, we are your Majesty's sworn responsible servants'—

"'So, so, because you are my servants, my Lord Farnborough, I am to be your puppet, eh? to register your decrees nolens volens? By those that begot me and these hands, no such thing, I will answer for it herewith. Look you, my Lord, and all of you that serve me; I am set over my people to protect them, and am answerable for them, to Him who set me over them: and if it cost me my crown, and you, as I shall very likely, my head to boot, I won't see the humblest creature calling me King, deprived of his life, even though according to law (which can't give back life taken wrongly), if I in my conscience do verily doubt whether he ought to die.'

"Lord Farnborough said something rather faintly about a constitutional monarchy:—

"'Ay,' said the King, catching the word, 'but I am also a conscientious King, my Lord! My advisers may be impeached in Parliament if they give me evil advice; but I have to answer to the King of Kings; and none but a King can tell a King's feelings in these matters. God Almighty only knows what I suffered some half a year ago, in a matter of this sort—eh, my Lord? What say you to that? Have you forgotten it?'

"'Not at all, please your Majesty; but I take leave humbly to represent, Sire, in the matter now before your Majesty, that your Majesty has no discretion herein, but must allow the law to his course'

"'I won't, I won't, my Lord. There are circumstances about this case that I don't like; and, in short, I shall not have this man die. Transport him for life, if you please; then, if we be wrong, he may return: but—there are paper, pens, and ink; pray, my Lord, sit to the table and write a pardon in the terms I prescribe; I will put my hand to it now—and then methinks I shall sleep sound.y till morning.'

"'Pardon me, Sire,' began his Lordship, with an air of vast deference

"'No, no! not you! I have nought to pardon you; 'tis another I mean to pardon.'

"'Sire, this really is one of the plainest cases of guilt'—

"'Did you not say the very same thing to me, my Lord, on the occasion I have just spoken of?' inquired the King very solemnly: 'did I not then say I had doubts? but I yielded to your certainty, my Lord! And what followed?'

"'Please your Majesty, we are all frail; all human institutions are liable to error.'

"'Therefore,' said the King quickly, 'ought we the longer to doubt, in matters of life and death, my Lord?'

"'I do assure your Majesty that this interference of your Majesty will give great disatisfaction'—

"'To whom? Where? Why?' inquired the King sternly. 'What is that to me, when my conscience is concerned, who have sworn an oath, when God Almighty placed my crown on my head, to cause law and justice, in MERCY, to be executed in all my judgments? Sir, I have sworn this oath, my people, or I? I did, and with God's assistance will keep my oath. And as for my people, they are a brave and virtuous people, and won't obey me the less, because I will not again let any one die on a gibbet, hastily.'

"Lord Farnborough remained with his eyes very seriously fixed on the King, and his pen in his hand, which hung down by his side.

"'Let it be done, my Lord,' said the King peremptorily: and his Minister obeyed."

BOOKS FOR CHRISTMAS.

Of late years a very intellectual fashion has sprung up—that of presenting Books "children of a larger growth." Formerly, such gifts were almost confined to the nursery and the play-room; but the custom has so advanced in importance, that it has given rise to a class of books, enlisting the genius of some of our best writers. The change, or rather the extension, of this Christmas custom, is, at least, a healthy invocation of the public taste: and, among the first fruits of the season, we are happy to chronicle the following:—

MIDSUMMER EVE: A FAIRY TALE OF LOVE. By MRS. S. C. HALL. Longman and Co.

This is a very elegant reprint from the Art Union Journal. The machinery is the belief that a child, whose birth-day is that before its birth, is placed by Nature under the guardianship of the Fairies; and that, if born on Midsummer Eve, it becomes their rightful property. Within this framework, Mrs. Hall has traced the progress of a young girl from her cradle to womanhood; the good and evil influences to which it is subjected; and the trials inseparable from a contact with the world.

All this is gracefully and picturesquely narrated; and accompanied by a profusion of engravings, which are the ideal of illustration. Among the artists are Maclise, Stanfield, Creswick, E. M. Ward, Elmore, Frost, J. Noel Paton, F. Goodall, Topham, Kenny Meadows, &c.; the majority of whose designs are a rich feast of fancy. The volume is sumptuously bound in green and gold, and is altogether produced in exquisite taste.

THE GOOD SHUNAMMITE. Longman and Co.

An illuminated missal-like volume, illustrating the sojourn of Elisha with the Shunnamite woman (2nd Kings, chap. iv.) First, we have a title-page, of florid design, in gold and colours; the incidents, pictured in six scenes, beautifully coloured, each page with an illuminated border, and each verse with an illuminated letter; the whole produced under the superintendence of Lewis Gruner. The binding is a clever imitation of antique carved work, of richly ornamented Gothic design.

THE PLAYMATE: A PEASANT Companion for Spare Hours. Cundall.

This is a miscellany for the play-room, illustrated in a style hitherto rarely attempted in books of this class. Their artistic spirit is really beautiful: they are upon steel and wood. The literary contents are tales and poems, vignettes from natural history, &c.; but the main charm of the book lies in the intellectual yet picturesque character of its engravings.

THE FAMILY JOE MILLER; a Drawing-Room Jest Book. Orr and Co.

An elegant reprint of "Joe Miller's Jests; or, The Wit's Vade-Mecum," interspersed with a number of repartees, of younger growth. The appearance of the book is wondrously seasonable, and, with its wit, old and new, will be acceptable to many a circle. The jests and witticisms are preceded by Joe Miller, a biography, a very entertaining account of Jack Mottley (for such was Joe Miller), his career as an actor and wit; the editions of his Jests, his portraits, &c. It contains very curious antiquarian and bibliographic gossip. The book is very neatly printed, and illustrated with a veritable portrait of the jester; a clever title-page by Kenny Meadows; Mottley's benefit ticket, designed by Hogarth; the Black Jack, Parliament-street, Clare Market, one of his favourite resorts; his tombstone in Portugal-street, &c.

TALES AND POEMS. By LORD BYRON. Orr and Co.

A reprint of "The Giaour," "The Bride of Abydos," "The Corsair," "The Siege of Corinth," and "The Prisoner of Chillon," sumptuously illustrated with engravings on steel, by E. Warren. The classic localities, as well as the leading incidents, of the Tales and Poems, are beautifully depicted, and engraved in chastely-effective style.

LORD RECTOR AND THE GLASGOW UNIVERSITY.—It has now been officially announced to the students attending the University that Colonel Mure, M.P. for the county of Renfrew, will be installed on Tuesday, the 4th proximo, when he will deliver his inaugural address, having been unavoidably prevented from doing so immediately before the Christmas holidays.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.—In conformity with the treaty lately concluded between Prussia and England, relative to copyright, two editions of the German translation of Bulwer's "Lucretia" have been seized at Berlin, and the publishers prosecuted.

In consequence of the new postal arrangements to come into operation on and after the 1st January next, which will reduce the foreign mails, which will be made up at the same hour as the inland mails, it is said to be the intention of the leading merchants to alter the Change hours for transacting business in the Foreign Exchanges, making them from two to three o'clock, instead of from three to four o'clock, the present hours. The alteration, it is expected, will be very acceptable to the clerks in foreign houses, who have hitherto been generally detained till late at business on the evenings preceding the foreign post nights.

BACHELORS. The delightful watering-place of Weston-super-Mare, among other attractions, presents the most favourable opportunities to bachelors, as there are now advertising there not less than eighty single ladies of all ages, whilst there are only two bachelors to raise their hopes and expectations.

THE Taj, mail steamer, from Southampton to the West Indies, put into Corunna on the 11th inst., with head and cutwater carried from the stem, and some slight damage to upper works. She started again in 48 hours on her voyage, all well. In consequence of the delay, the captain intended to proceed direct to St. Thomas, without calling at Grenada, by which arrangement he would make up for lost time

ATTEMPTED MURDER.—A person named John Griffiths was committed by the bench of magistrates at Wolverhampton, on Saturday last, for having attempted to murder Mr Cooper, the surgeon to the union workhouse, by stabbing him in the abdomen. Mr. Cooper had on that day gone into one of the wards of the union, when the prisoner flew at him, and plunged a knife at his abdomen saying, "You are the person I want to see." The point of the knife came in contact with the buckle of a belt, or he must have been instantaneously killed. In answer to the charge, he stated that Mr. Cooper had refused to let him go into the able-bodied side of the house, and he was determined to finish him yet. One of the paupers said that he had frequently heard the prisoner say he would murder Mr. Cooper some day or other.

OUR DOMESTIC COLUMN.

THE ORPHAN'S CHRISTMAS TREE.

(From a Correspondent.)

Thro'out the streets of a fair city
'Twas the eve of Christmas Day,
A little friendless stranger
Pursued his weary way.

His heart was full of sorrow,
And he bitterly did cry:
"Though all around are happy,
I wish that I could die:

"The lights are shining in each hall,
And the streets are bright as day,
And the Christmas Tree is glittering
With gold and flowers gay.

"And through the frozen window panes,
Fair children's forms I see,
All joyful, gay, and happy,
But none remember me.

"Oh! Once I had a mother
And a bright and joyful home:
Why did she go away from me
Beyond the skies to roam?

"And leave her little orphan
To wander through the cold,
Without a roof to shelter him,
In garments torn and old.

"In all this night's rejoicing,
Is there no one that hears?
No corner in one ha-py heart
For Charity to be?

"Is there no nook in some wide hall,
Where I unseen may lie?
Or where I may, unheeded,
Pour forth my bitter cry?
I'd rest me there and die.

"Oh, dear and holy Christ!" he cried,
"I have no friend but thee:
Though all the world forsake me
I pray thou turn not from me."

"I've no father, I've no mother,
And my life is well nigh gone;
Have pity on me Holy One
For I am all alone."

Then, with his frozen little hands
He lapsed at many a pace,
But 'mid the din of revelry
His feeble cry was vain.

At length o'ercome with want and woe,
He heaved a last faint sigh;
And on the cold and icy earth,
He laid him down to die.

But soon as on this cruel world
His heavy eyes were closed,
And peaceful in the sleep of death
His weary limbs reposed,

There broke a vision on his sight
That filled his heart with joy!
And sounds of music and of joy
Came floating through the air.

Then, by his side a spirit stood,
With crow of dazzling light,
Of children form and stature,
And robed in garments white.

It said "I am that holy Christ
You call'd upon but now,
And I once was in this mortal world
As sorrowful as thou

"Poor little lonely stranger,
I will thy father be;
For never did one call in vain
Who truly called on me.

"Then look up child of misery,
Behold thy Christmas Tree;"
And tell me, in you glittering halls
Can there a farer be?"

He raised his radiant hand towards Heaven,
And forth stood gloriously,
With branches glittering o'er with stars,
The Orphan's Christmas Tree.

And Angels bending from the skies,
Stretched forth their hands to him:
And drew him to that father-land
Peopled with Christendom.

There all his bitter tears are dried,
And all his sorrows o'er:
And in the arms of Holy Christ
He rests for evermore.

Then, little children list my tale,
And pray to God on high,
Who holds the Orphan's cause in care,
And hears the humblest cry.

HOW TO MAKE A CHRISTMAS TREE

The Christmas-tree is the top of a young pine, fixed in a large flower-pot, or tub, filled with mould, which, with the pot or tub, is hidden by moss, so as to represent a small enclosed garden. It is placed in a room: the branches of the fir are trimmed a little up to the very top, and small rounded holes are bored, pot into little tin sockets made for the purpose, and fixed on each branch at the smallest possible distance from each other; so that, when these are all lighted, the fine apples in one perfect blaze. The branches are decorated with flowers, gilded apples, walnuts, and other bonbons; interspersed, here and there, with painted wax, and hung with gifts, which are destined not only for the members of the family, but frequently for the servants. In all cases, a few days before the appointed time, when all is prepared, the doors of the room, in which the tree has been thus decorated and illuminated, are thrown open, and the company assembled, evidently dazzled by its brilliance, expressions of admiration are made on all sides, and, when these are over, and the sight sufficiently gratified, then there commences a most animated merry scene, in the tree being pulsered of its fruit and bonbons till all have received their portion, either labelled, with the names of the parties for whom they are intended, or they are numbered; and, in the latter case, the parties are furnished with corresponding numbers on slips of paper, and they claim their respective gifts accordingly.—From a very useful and entertaining volume, entitled "The German Christmas Tree."

SPREAD OF EPIDEMIC DISEASES

It is a matter of universal experience that certain physical conditions promote both the intensity and extension of epidemic diseases. These conditions are comprised in impure and humid air and unsuitable food, or—what more rarely occurs amidst a population, in which upwards of £24,000,000 per annum, or more than five pounds to the amount of the poor rates, is spent in order to avert spiritual decay, or nearly an equal amount in tobacco and fermented liquors—want of means to obtain sufficient food; to these are added the causes of insufficient clothing, sometimes ill-constructed dwellings, and defective appliances for the regulation of warmth or protection against cold.—First Report of the Metropolitan Sanatory Commissioners

CHRISTMAS CUSTOM.

The church of Santa Maggiore, in Rome, possesses a trough said to be the manger in which the infant Saviour was laid. It is made of wood, and is now discoloured and nearly rotten boards, and is carefully preserved in a magnificent crystal case. On Christmas morning, before break of day, it is carried in solemn procession round the church, and devotees kneel down and kiss it, and it is open to pay it adoration.—The Boat and the Caravan, an excellent "Family Tour."

LADIES IN INDIA.

In the olden time, it was considered a reproach to a woman that she was going to India. Her enterprise was regarded as an ineffable attempt to force herself upon the hapless bachelors of the East, whose pretensions she was supposed to measure by the length of their respective purses, and the chances of their early dissolution.—From Real Life in India, a capital Guide to the Indian Public Service; just published.

LONDON SEWERS CONDEMNED

Not the slightest precaution appears to be used to guard against the choking up of our metropolitan sewers. No immediate inconvenience results, and there is plenty of room, and to spare, we may be sure, when we hear from the City Surveyor's delivery, in his evidence before the Select Committee of Commission, that even coffins and tombstones, a bedstead, and the handle of the pursuit, lie in them, to be detected only in case of a general survey. Under a properly regulated system, how easily would these abuses be prevented.—First Report of the Metropolitan Sanatory Commissioners.

THE GOOD VICAR.

Mr Hylton had no income except that derived from his vicarage; and being very easy in the matter of his tithes, was sometimes not inconsiderably inconvenienced. Yet the vicar was substantial and unostentatious, fond of port; good Mr. Hylton and her housekeeper made their cowslip, ginger, and elderberry wine, ever in the season; and many a bottle of it had been carried by Mr. Hylton, himself, on his visits, to which the parishioners in the kept sick were always entitled. He was of Every-one's-cow; for when it had yielded sufficient, every morning and evening, for the wants of the parsonage, any one else who pleased might similarly supply themselves from what was left. Every one knew when hours were always to be seen one or two of the poorer villagers, pitcher in hand, waiting for their turn. From "Now and Then," by S. Warren, F.R.S.; just published.

THE PRINCESS ROYAL

The following interesting address to the Princess Royal was lately current at Windsor. Mr. Brown, the apothecary to the Castle, was in the habit of visiting the Royal children every morning, and the Princess pursuaded to address Brown, Her governess insisted that "Mr." should be prefixed, and threatened that, if her little royal Highness did not remember this on the next occasion, she should be sent to bed as a punishment. The morning after, when Mr. Brown appeared, the Princess, addressing him, said: "Good morning, Brown —and good night, too, for I am just going to bed."—Family Jo: Mille

ELEGANT STARVATION

A thoughtless young gentleman, of good family, although he had spent every shilling, and worn out every trace of credit, lived, with a devoted partner of his poverty, in a splendid villa near the Regent's park. Jewels, books, wearing Apparel, and every description of movable, had long disappeared from this exquisite residence, to supply the common necessaries of life. "Yesterday," our hero boasted to a confidential friend, towards the end of this ruin, "we supped off a pair of car-rings. That case of champagne in the coal-cellar is the production of some thirty very dry volumes of the "Encyclopedia Britannica. We have dined during the past week off my dress coat; and this very day I had the honor for my polished boots, we should have been obliged to break fast without Boogmas." Of course, these fearful privations increased, till, some time after, they reached a climax. One day, the hopeful economist returned home, about dinner-time, in a state of famishing hunger, and entreated his lovely housekeeper to order dinner. "Dinner?" she repeated, "there is not a scrap in the house, nor an article left to procure one with!" "Surely," exclaimed the other, slapping his forehead in despair, "something can be snatches from the wreck I have it. We can yet avert from our countenances the horrid stare of starvation. Tis a desperate act, but it must be done!" "What?" inquired the lady anxiously. "What? Why, fry the gold fish, and roast the canary!"—Family Jo: Mille.

PICKLED EGGS

In the counties of Hants and Dorset, Pickled Eggs constitute a very prominent feature in the farmhouse store-rooms. The mode in which the good dames pickle them is simply thus: at the season of the year when their stock of eggs is plentiful, they boil some four or six dozen in a capacious saucepan until they become quite hard. They then, after removing the shells, lay, them carefully in large-mouthed jars, and pour over them scalding vinegar, well seasoned with whole pepper, allspice, a few pieces of ginger, and a few cloves of garlic. When cold, they are bunged down close, and in a month are fit for use. Where eggs are plentiful the above pickle is by no means expensive, and as a relishing accompaniment to cold meat.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Money has been rather more in demand during the week, both on the Discount Market and Stock Exchange. In the Discount Market prices have varied according to circumstances, from 5¼ to 7 per cent.; on the Stock Exchange 4 per cent. is about the average.

The Directors of the Bank of England, at their usual weekly meeting, on Thursday, reduced the rate of discount on ordinary commercial paper to 8 per cent. It is understood that an animated discussion preceded this decision.

The suspension of Messrs. Thomas and Joseph Sands and Co., of Liverpool, American merchants, and owners of the screw steamer, Sarah Sands, transpired on Monday. The liabilities are stated to be £60,000; and anticipations of a favourable liquidation can scarcely be indulged in

In order to harmonise business with the new foreign postal arrangements, a resolution has been agreed to by the leading merchants, "That from and after the commencement of the new year, 'Change hours on Tuesdays and Fridays shall be from two to three o'clock, instead of from three to four o'clock.

The private advices by the Overland Mail indicate that when intelligence shall be received to the effect produced at Calcutta by the whole of the failures on this side, it will prove disastrous. Up to the date of these advices the only failures announced in connexion with the East were those of Messrs. Dowbiggin, Gow and Co., and Reid, Irving, and Co. So great was the alarm produced even from these, that private bills on England appear to have become unsaleable, while it is remarked by some writers, "we see nothing but present ruin for the Calcutta ..... With regard, however, to the balance of trade, some improvement (except as regards the China market) may be considered to have taken place. The demand for manufactured goods has been well maintained, while exports both from Bombay and Calcutta have been less active. The accounts of the posture of affairs in Upper India, of late, appear to represent it as not being likely to suffer in connexion with the English failures announced up to the last dates, and it is also said that their immediate liabilities, in the shape of deposits, do not exceed £2,000, while, for their present and future engagements coming due, they are provided with produce, against which they can draw on this country." It is, however, admitted that the mass of the capital of the concern is irretrievably locked up in indigo factories, and it seems, therefore, vain to expect that they can sustain themselves when the full news of our failures, which are certain to hit some of the heavy debtors of the bank, shall have arrived out, together with the drafts which, since the 24th of October, have been returned dishonoured by our London agents. This is the last mail which will bring remittances to the suspended houses on this side. The amount received by Messrs. Cockerell and Co., on bills of exchange, is, we understand, between £30,000 and £40,000.

The long anticipated meeting of the creditors of Messrs. Trueman and Cook took place on Wednesday, when the report of Mr. Coleman, the accountant, addressed to the Bank Solicitors, was read to the meeting. The total liabilities amounted to £319,780 1os. 2d., and the assets to £336,324 7s. 8d. In calculating the assets, allowance, of course, must be made for the probabilities of loss arising from the winding up of so different a business as that firm with whom Messrs Trueman and Cook were connected. The following offer was made to the meeting, and accepted:—"That the house are prepared to pay 20s in the pound The first instalment on the 18th of January, 1848; a second on the 18th of May; the third on the 18th September, 1848. Afterwards two instalments of 2s. 6d. in the pound, payable on the 18th of January, and 18th of April 1849." The inspectors appointed were Joshua Bates, Esq., Henry D. Blyth, Esq., and Eve Erickson, Esq. Mr. Trueman, sen., Mr. Trueman, jun., and Mr. William Cook, are relieved from attending the administration, which will be conducted by Mr. Cook and Mr. Walker. It was also agreed that any of the partners might act as broker.

The events of the week in the various markets have been quite unimportant. On Monday the English Funds opened with a slight improvement upon Saturday's closing quotations, marking 85 for the opening ex. div. An improvement to 85¾ to ⅞ was the result of the day's operations, although some sales, at one period, had receded for a moment, to the quotation of 84¾ 85. On Tuesday there was a general absence of business; and, the Market showing signs of flatness, an endeavour to still further depress it was made by an absurd rumour of the abdication of Louis Philippe, but was added, that some fear for news of an insurrection in Greece. Prices, consequently, yielded, receding to 84¾ ex. div., but afterwards attained the previous day's closing quotation. Wednesday's market was inactive, many of the usual dealers having, in the pressed dull state of affairs prepared for quitting town during the Christmas holidays. Consols were closed at 85 ⅛ ¼ ex. div. for the opening. On Thursday there was rather more buoyancy, in consequence of the reduction in the rate of discount at the Bank Directors. The closing prices of the week are:—Reduced, 84¾; New ½, per Cent Anns., 85¾; Long Anns., 8 11-16; India Bonds, 2os; £1000, 11 dis.; South Sea Stock, Old Annuities, 85¾; Consols for Account, 85¾; Exchequer Bills, £1000, 9 pr.; Ditto, £500, 11 pr.; Ditto, Small, 9 pr.

The variations in the Foreign Market have been confined to the difference, between the buying and selling prices. The latest business that have been made are at the following rates:—Chilian Bonds 6 per cent., 88; Ditto, Three per Cent, 4; Ecuador Bonds, 2¼; Granada accordingly, (for per Cents, 17¾; Twin Deferred, 3¾; Mexican, Five per Cent, 1846, 17¾; Portuguese, Four per Cent, 22¾; Russian Bonds, 107; Spanish Five per Cent, 1840, 18¾; Ditto, Passive, 4; Ditto, Three per Cent, 29¾; Dutch Two-and-a-half per Cent, 57¾ ⅝.

The Share Market has been very heavy, with a considerable depreciation in prices This may, however, be regarded as a natural result of the late failures, and the pressure for money. During the period of a pressure for money, railways became a favourite sources of investment; and the surplus capital of various pursuits was extensively embarked, particularly in the established lines. Necessity arising from a general indisposition to give credit has rendered sales; hence the present decline. This will, however, after a short period, right itself, and extraving confidence will nowhere be more quickly demonstrated than in the Share Market. The market does not close quite so heavily as on the previous Saturday. The following prices of the Stocks last dealt in will best show its present state:—Brand.—The prices of wheaten stead in the Metropolis are from 7½d to 8d; of household ditto, 6½d to 7½d per 4-lb loaf Imperial Weekly Average. Wheat, 38s 2d; barly, 20s 7d; oats, 2 s 7d, (7s, 3s 4 ; and rye, 31s 6d; peas, 34s 9d.

The Six Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 38s 10; barley, 31s 3d; oats, 22s 7d; rye, 32s 3d; peas, 31s 6d; peas, 35s 6d.

Tea.—Rather more business is doing in this market; but, in prices, we have no improvement to notice. The deliveries are very moderate.

Rice. Very few sales have taken place this week; yet prices are pretty generally supported.

Provisions.—Per Dutch butter the demand is steady, at full last week's prices. Fine ox.ne is selling at 104s to 105s other fine qualities 96s to 103s; and inferior and ordinary, 84s per cwt. The stocks are barely small. Irish meat ranges quite as low as last rates. Carlow, landed, 93s to 95s, Clonmel and Kilkenny, 90s to 92s; Belfast, 87s to 90s; and Sligo, 84s to 86s per cwt. On board, next to nothing is doing. English butter is steady, at 106s to 112s for fine Dorset, 94s to 98s for middling, 90s to 104s for fine Devon, and 10s to 14s per dozen lbs for stock of bacon being on the premises, that article is heavy, at barely late rates. Fine Waxford, landed, 63s to 66s; ditto, 62s to 65s; prime Limerick, 63s to 65s; and heavy, 62s to 64s per cwt. In other articles we have no change to notice.

Tallow.—P.Y.C., on the spot, is quiet, at 46s to 46s 6d, for small parcels For delivery, during the first three months of next year, the price is 44s per cwt.

Spirits.—Jamaica rum—the supply of which is now limited—moves off steadily at full prices, or from 1s to 2s per gallon more. East India is dull, at 1s to 1s 4d; proof. Brandy is quite as dear

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, £3 10s to £ ; clover ditto, £3 10s to £4 14s, and straw, £1 to £1 10s per load

Coals.—Ashby, 23s; Davison's West Hartley, 18s 6d, New Tanfield, 18s; West Wylam, 17s 3d; Haswell, 21s 9d; Lambton, 21s 6d, and Stewart's, 22s per ton.

Potatoes. The best parcels are still selling at from 130s to 140s per ton. The secondary sorts are quite as dear

Smithfield. Prime beef has commanded a free sale, at advanced currencies In other kinds of meat a steady business has been transact ; at full prices

Beef, from 2s 6d to 3s 6d; mutton, 3s 8d to 4s 8d; veal, 3s 8d to 4s 8d; and pork, 3s 4d to 4s 8d per 8lbs, by the carcase.

MARKETS.

CORN-EXCHANGE.—Coastwise, as well as by land carriage and steamb, the arrivals of English wheat have been on a fair average scale, but greatly out of condition Fine dry qualities have commanded a steady demand, at an advance of 1s per quarter; while all inferior parcels, and the value of the to shifting and inferior kinds has been well supported. There has been more business doing in foreign wheat, but we can notice no improvement in prices. Barley moves off slowly, at in some instances, a decline of 1s per quarter. For malt the inquiry has been fair, at late rates The best oats have sold freely—other parcels slowly—at unaltered figures. Both beans and peas must be considered the turn lower. Indian corn and flour are quite as dear. Oats supported at late rates.

"THE ADORATION OF THE SHEPHERDS."—FROM THE PICTURE BY REMBRANDT, IN THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

THE ADORATION OF THE SHEPHERDS.

PAINTED BY REMBRANDT.

We have engraved, as illustrative of the Season, one of the masterpieces of Rembrandt, in our National Gallery. The composition of the Picture is thus described in the enlarged, authorised edition of the Catalogue of the Collection, just published:—

The scene is a dark stable, or cattle-shed; the illumination of the picture proceeding, almost entirely, as in the "Notte" of Correggio, from the Infant Saviour. The effect of this supernatural light is much enhanced by the comparative faintness of the rays from the lantern in the hands of one of the shepherds, and the principal group is forcibly relieved by the deep shadow of the kneeling figure in the foreground; a second group is just entering the shed on the right; the remotest figure bearing another lantern.

The picture is painted on canvass, 2ft. 1in. h. by 1ft. 10in. w. It is marked "Rembrandt, f. 1646;" it was formerly in the Angerstein collection, with which it was purchased by Parliament for the nation; and thus became a portion of the nucleus of "the National Gallery."

Fuseli thus eloquently describes the characteristics of Rembrandt's style. "He was a genius of the first class, in whatever relates not to form. In spite of most portentous deformity, and without considering the spell of his chiaroscuro, such were his powers of nature, such the grandeur, pathos, or simplicity of his composition, from the most ...vated or extensive arrangement to the meanest or most homely, that the best cultivated eye, the purest sensibility, and the most refined taste, dwell on them equally enthralled."

We could add many a poetic inspiration, relating the sublime event of this picture; the following is by an eloquent living poet:—

Then knowest, Merciful!
That knowest all things, and dost ever turn
Thine eye of pity on our guilty nature;
For thou wert born of woman: thou didst come,
Oh Holiest! to this world of sin and gloom,
Not in thy dread omnipotent array
And not by thunders strewed
Was thy tempestuous road;
Nor indignation burnt before thee on thy way.
But thee, a soft and naked child,
Thy mother undefiled
In the rude manger laid to rest
From off her virgin breast.

The heavens were not commanded to prepare
A gorgeous canopy of golden air;
Nor stooped their lamps th' enthroned fires on high
A single silent star
Came wandering from afar,
Gliding unchecked and calm along the liquid sky;
The Eastern sages leading on,
As at a kingly throne,
To lay their gold and odours sweet,
Before thy infant feet.

The earth and ocean were not hushed to hear
Bright harmony from every starry sphere;
Nor at Thy presence brake the voice of song
From all the cherub choirs,
And seraphs' burning lyres
Poured through the host of heaven the charmed clouds along.
One angel troop the strain began,
Of all the race of man
By simple shepherds heard alone,
That soft Hosanna's tone.—MILMAN.

...sches of the Emperor Napoleon, the nave and choir of the Church of the Invalides were filled with old officers and functionaries of the Empire, wearing the Imperial uniform. The ex-King Jerome, his son, and the Princess Mathilde de Demidoff, his daughter, were seated in a pew on the right. A great number of the Invalids and the staff of the establishment were also present. After the mass the ex-King Jerome and his children remained some time behind in prayer.

POST-OFFICE NOTICE.—The Brazilian Post-office having consented to withdraw the charge which it had imposed on newspapers from the United Kingdom delivered in Brazil, on and after the 1st of January next, no charge will be made in the United Kingdom on British newspapers posted in accordance with the usual restrictions, addressed to Brazil, when conveyed by packet; and, in like manner, Brazilian newspapers addressed to the United Kingdom, and brought to this country by packet, will be delivered free from postage.

MONTHLY MAILS.—Notices were issued on Monday, at the General Post Office, announcing that an arrangement has been made for despatching one of her Majesty's ships, on the first of every month, to the western coast of Africa, calling at Madeira and Sierra Leone; and that mails to be conveyed by such vessels will in future be made up on the evening of the last day of the month; or, when that day falls on a Sunday, on the previous evening. All letters and newspapers for Sierra Leone, not directed to be forwarded by any other vessel, will be despatched by these mails. Letters and newspapers for Madeira or for any part of the western coast of Africa, except Sierra Leone, intended to be sent by these vessels, must be specially addressed by "Her Majesty's ship ——." The name of the vessel will be announced in the packet list about the 26th of every month. Mails will be made up for Madeira, the Cape of Good Hope, Sydney, and New Zealand, to be conveyed by her Majesty's steamer Acheron. The postage on letters to Madeira will be 1s. 10d. per half-ounce, and so on; newspapers, 2d. each, which must be prepaid. Letters to the Cape of Good Hope, &c., 1s. per half ounce. No charge [illegible]

...OMENON.—During the recent gale, a phenomenon, which has been before noticed with respect to the river Parrott, at Bridgewater, occurred there in the return of the tide. About four o'clock on Sunday morning, the wind blowing a strong gale from the W.S.W., and after the tide had ebbed for about three feet, leaving the vessels in the river aground, a tremendous roaring of the sea was heard. All doubt was soon removed by the approach of the bore-head, a large wave nearly eight feet high bearing up, carrying everything before it, and nearly swamping all the laden vessels in the river, many of which were seriously damaged. The storm lasted a quarter of an hour.

THE LATE FIRE AT SE[illegible]. Howland, the master of the ship Robert G. Shaw, which drifted, on fire, lately upon the south coast of England, writes from Havre that the vessel, which was from Charleston, with a cargo of cotton and rice, was struck by lightning, passing down the forecastle, and setting the cotton on fire in the ship's hold, on the 6th instant, about 45 miles north of Ushant, the ship lying to under a close reefed maintopsail at the time. The crew used every exertion to keep the fire down, and made all sail the ship could carry, in order to get her into some port on the English coast before the fire broke out, but they found that impossible, and were obliged to leave the ship in the long boat.

MUSIC.

DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

'THE MAID OF HONOUR," Opera in Three Acts. Music by BALFE; Libretto by FITZBALL.

On Monday night, this work was produced with signal success. The house was crowded in every part; amongst the auditory were the most distinguished amateurs and professors. There was much to provoke curiosity—a new opera by Balfe must always be a matter of interest, and there was not only Mr. Reeves' appearance in an original character, but there were three débutantes in the cast, namely, Miss Birch, Miss Miran, and Mrs. Weiss. Mr. Balfe was much cheered on taking his place in the orchestra. At the end of the first act, Mr. Reeves, Miss Birch, and Miss Miran were called for; at the termination of the opera' there were ovations for the composer, principal singers, and even for M. Jullien. The voice of journalism has generally been strongly in favour of "The Maid of Honour," and yet with all these demonstrations, we must take leave to doubt whether the opera can be permanently attractive, and whether it will add to Mr. Balfe's fame. Our reasons for this conclusion must be gathered from a rapid analysis of the musical and dramatic situations. The libretto has been taken from the ballet of "Lady Henriette," originally produced at the Parisian Académie de Musique, and transferred to Drury-Lane boards, during Mr. Bunn's management.

We do not think the subject well adapted for "a grand opera!" The incidents mi.ht make a two-act comic opera; but, in order to spin them out to the required proportions, the dramatic writer has introduced scenes which only impede the progress of the action, interrupt the story, disturb the interest, and render the whole tiresome and dull. The composer's inspiration seems to have been infected by the monotonous plot; for in his overture he has taken the themes of a mere episode in the drama—the Masque. It is the worst instrumental piece we have heard from Balfe—without plan, design, or coherency—and only remarkable for a very common-place Castro polka motif. The epoch of the libretto is fixed in the reign of Queen Elizabeth (in the ballet it is under Queen Anne's rule). The first scene is in the state apartments, and a three-part madrigal is sung of the Elizabethan era, by the ladies of the choir. This madrigal is accompanied by the full orchestra; but we do not perceive any reason why the orthodox mode of executing these quaint compositions should not have been employed, namely, the singers with the parts in their hands, sitting around tables, and executing them without the aid of the band. The remainder of this scene is taken up with a concerted piece, in which Sir Trustram (the Queen's Chamberlain), Mr. Weiss, tries to dissuade Lady Henriette (Miss Birch) and Athon (Miss Miran) from their purpose to visit a Statute Fair, disguised as servant girls. Scena the second is Greenwich Fair, but there was nothing particular in the descriptive music except its noise and the vulgarity of the dance. A little bit of a two-part song, "We come when you ring the bell," sung by Misses Birch and Miran, was an oasis in the desert. In the third scene is the interior of the house of Lyonnel (Mr. Reeves), a wealthy Kentish yeoman, who, with Walter, (Mr. Whitworth), his friend, has hired the two maids of honour, as servants. We now arrive at the publisher's ragion—the ballad order of music. Mr. Reeves had the first start in "Revolt the happy home," with the somewhat exploded sentiment, that truth can only prevail in the cottage, and not at all in the courtly domicile, where the "carpet of silk" and "the tapestry of gold" are seen. Mr. Reeves sang it with excellent expression, and it was encored; it will remind the hearer of an Irish melody, and as Barret played a delicious oboe accompaniment, the effect was great. Miss Birch had the next ballad, "It was the Red-cross Knight," and this was called for a second time, but the ayes had a battle with the noes to carry the day. Had the vocalist paid as much attention to the words, as she did to the notes, greater unanimity might have prevailed. Considering the important part this elegant melody is made to play throughout the opera, it ought to have been given with more feeling. The yeomen, as may be presumed, fall in love with the supposed servants, who, however, make their escape with the aid of Trustram, when the masters have retired to rest. And here is the most poetical and picturesque situation in the entire production:—Lyonnel, deeply enamoured of Henriette, is seen sleeping uneasy and feverish in his chair—the air that she has sung floating in the memory, and coming out in detached intervals; the voices of Henriette, Athon, and Trustram, subdued and fearful, are heard like gliding spirits in the background, as they make their escape; whilst the orchestration, with a lovely effect of the stringed instruments muted, keep up an undercurrent highly descriptive of the action. This finale is one of Balfe's happiest notions.

Are we never to be relieved from the eternal Chorus of Hunters, introduced in operas? It will not be in the first scene of the second act of "The Maid of Honour;" and, as usual, a drinking-song is appended. The cavatina, "Prime the cup," is written distressingly high for Mr. Whitworth, whose intonation was sadly at fault. There is a gentlemanlike style about the singer's department, which causes regret that his vocal powers are so deficient. The entrance of Queen Elizabeth, on a real white horse, afforded Mrs. Weiss, in a cavatina, "Far from gilded state away," to display a voice of great compass. Her high notes were well sustained, but we do not think the passages were telling, in proportion to their difficulties. A charming air, "Sweet rose, I would that near this heart," sung by Miss Birch, was disfigured by a bravura flight, totally out of place. The duo, in which Lyonnel recognises Lady Henriette, as his quondam servant.—"'Tis she—bright spirits hover round"—is charmingly conceived. The solo, "O cruel beauty," is an impassioned cantabile, exquisitely rendered by Reeves. This duo is one of the vocal gems of the opera. The saving of the Queen's life by Lyonnel—the knighting of the yeoman by the genteel Monarch—and the unmasking of the maids of honour, at his request, in order to identify his lady-love—are embodied in a concerted piece, in a sestet, and in the finale. Herein Balfe develops divers Amherish themes, and Verdi crescendoes, but the ensemble is not well constructed, and the effect is flat. This was sensibly felt at the fall of the curtain.

The third act opens in the Throne-room. There is a comic scena for Weiss. "Now prepare all," descriptive of managerial troubles in getting up the grand Masque. This is written in imitation of the pure Italian buffo school, and it was executed with much spirit, but little humour, by Weiss. In Labiache's hands such a scena would be a mine of comicality. The Masque is a copy from Gluck. The trombone passages served to show of Cioffi's colossal power. The air of Orpheus, "Dulcet Music," sung by Miss Miran, was encored; but, owing to the mechanist's prompt display of the lost Eurydice, it was not repeated. The débutante displayed a mellow-toned contralto of delightful quality: her style is unfinished, as was perceived in the shake, which she began well, but did not terminate so fortunately. The duo, "I hear thy voice, oh! Orpheus," between Miss Birch and Miss Miran, is full of tenderness. At this stage of the story, nothing could be worse managed, dramatically and musically. Lyonnel, who is her Majesty's favourite, and has been raised to honour and distinction, stands by her side during the Masque, and in Eurydice recognises his lost lady-love. Distracted, he rushes forward, and throws himself at her feet, and is about to destroy himself in presence of the entire Court. Here was an opportunity, of course, for a morceau d'ensemble, to describe the conflicting emotions of all present. How has it been rendered? Miss Birch comes down to the stage lamps with the Masque—the courtiers, soldiers, attendants, &c. "retire to a respectful distance" (sic in libretto); her Majesty, a Lady Aylesbury coiffure, and not in the golden locks sung by the Elizabethan poets, condescendingly stands in the centre of the circle of Honour, and during this torpid state of hundreds of spectators, Miss Birch warbles a dismal ditty, calling upon Lyonnel not to tail takes; but as he is the crack tenor, he must not be deprived of his usual scena, so he does try again to kill himself, and is dragged off, to the dismay of Miss Birch, and to the wonder of Mrs. Weiss, who, after looking at each other for a moment, walked off also, to the evident amusement of the whole house at this droll climax. At this period of the opera, it was in a certainly critical state; but, thanks to the beauty of Reeves, in the last scene, the denouement was saved from a catastrophe. The interior of Lyonnel's house is again visible, and the lunatic lover is brought in by Walter, her Majesty having resolved to try the recovery of his reason, by making the maids of honour resume the costume of the servants, as in the first scene. Reeves gave a ballad, "In the old cellar my father sat," with a pathos that brought tears into many eyes, and it was fervently encored. It is in these appeals to the domestic feelings that Balfe's genius as a ballad writer reigns supreme.

We subjoin the subject in notation, and the words. The pianoforte accompaniment to this song, and the whole of the words, are published by Chappell, in Bond-street.

The restoration of Lyonnel's senses is accomplished by Lady Henriette, who sings the melody whicl. first captivated the yeoman. An adagio that he sings at the conclusion, "Better were it," was delivered with a dramatic intensity that took the house by storm. The finale rondo, "Tell, oh, my heart," is a florid display of vocalisation for Miss Birch, with whose cadenzas and disjointed diversions we were not altogether gratified, although, on the whole, she rattled through the bravura bravely.

We never listened to any new production by Mr. Balfe which, in the ensemble, pleased us less than "The Maid of Honour." It is far inferior to his "Bondman." There is a great straining for effect, and an over-elaboration—faults not perceptible in Balfe's former style. His gift is spontaneity and melodious impulse: the moment he tries to be learned, he is lost in a labyrinth of confused effects. He would have done well, as he was the Conductor, to have restored the original arrangement of the orchestra, the brass of which is quite stunning for the audience, whilst the stringed instruments can only be heard to perfection on the stage. No expense seems to have been spared in the mise en scene; but, in the stage business, there were ind cations of great hurry, and the want of proper rehearsals. With such masses, more effective grouping ought to have been witnessed.

The success of the opera may be ascribed to the admirable singing of the tenor; and this without any disparagement of the talent of the three débutantes, for the most music and the best dramatic situations are allotted to Lyonnel. Lady Henriette might be made more interesting than it was by Miss Birch, whose rigidity is very provoking, with her superb organ and fine execution—but what is a singer without dramatic sensibility? Miss Miran, in whom we recognised Miss Wilmshurst, of the Royal Academy of Music, and who is, we understand, a sister of Miss Laura Addison, is a very promising actress, as well as singer. Mrs. Weiss, who was known as Miss Burrett, of the Royal Academy, has a magnificent voice. Here were three singers, all possessing voices of delicious quality, and yet, not one of them, in the true sense of the word, can be styled a real artiste. Whence this deficiency arises we may, at some future time, endeavour to explain; but, the fact is too remarkable not to be signalised here.

SURREY THEATRE.

Miss Poole appeared on Tuesday night in an English adaptation, by Mr. Fitzball, of Donizetti's "Figlia del Reggimento," with eminent success. A more charming piece of acting than Miss Poole's Marva was never witnessed on any stage; and if she did not rival Mdlle. Lind, in the vocal portion, we question whether any other English singer could have approached Miss Poole, in the charm of her voice, and in the purity and correctness of her intonation. She was received from first to last with the greatest tokens of gratification; nothing was wanting for her triumph—and the English ovations and encores were as rapturous as those of an excitable Italian auditory. She sang the rataplan in the first scene with indescribable naveté, playing the drum to perfection; and her march off the stage, at the head of the regiment, was most spiritedly done. There was not the slightest tinge of coarseness in her assumption of the Vivandière. In the singing lesson, and in the trio, in which the Sergeant and Marva rataplan the enraged Marchioness if the stage, the sensation created by Miss Poole was prodigious. She gave the coup-de-grace to the pretty Tyrolean melody which runs through the opera—with power and brilliancy. She was encored three times, and called before the curtain. The Sergeant Sulpizio was enacted and sung by Mr. Phillips with considerable humour; and Mrs. Daly's clever assumption of the proud Marchioness contributed to the effect of the ensemble. Mr. Tully conducted the orchestra with praiseworthy skill. "The Daughter of the Regiment," with the vivacity and singing of Miss Poole, will no doubt be a fortunate hit for Mr. Bunn, who has evidently taken pains in the mounting of this lively opera.

JENNY LIND AT HOME.—This delightful songstress creates quite as great a furore in her own native city of Stockholm (if not greater) as she has in foreign lands. On the 2d instant, she performed at the Royal Opera, Stockholm, and although tickets were to have been sold at the theatre office, from ten o'clock on the preceding afternoon, at about four, the Adolphus place, where the Opera stands, was already nearly crowded. At eleven the multitude was such that the police interfered, and made the people form en queue, but a little after midnight a compact mass of persons made an irruption from the neighbouring streets, rushed on the queue, broke it, and actually besieged the theatre. Nevertheless, the first crowd returned, attacked their aggressors, and in a few minutes a desperate fist and foot combat followed. Several persons were severely bruised on the occasion. Detachments of infantry at length, with great trouble, succeeded in clearing the Adolphus-place, and only 2000 persons, or twice the number the theatre could hold, were suffered to approach its office. In the course of the day tickets were paid for as high as fifty times what they had cost at the office. Some of those for the amphitheatre first places were sold at 100 bank rix dollars, or £22. The reception given to Jenny within the theatre was most enthusiastic; every known "ovation" was conferred on her, including that of which Italy has reserved to herself the privilege—the flying of pigeons in the house. Much of this enthusiasm was no doubt created by the admiration felt at her having on the previous evening published in the journals a note stating that, in order to give her native country a souvenir that might last beyond her existence as an artiste, she had determined on devoting to the establishment of a school for poor young persons of both sexes, born with happy dispositions, in which they should gratuitously be taught music and the dramatic art, the whole of the profits of an engagement which she has just concluded with the Royal Opera, and which stipulates that she should sing once a week in December, January, and February, on condition of half of the whole receipts, on every night of her appearance, being given to her, and of a half being added to the prices of places.

LIBERTY OF THE PRESS IN FRANCE.—During the last seventeen years no less than 1129 prosecutions have been directed against the journals in the name of King Louis Philippe, who inaugurated his accession to the throne by a formal promise that a prosecution should be in future instituted against the press only on the complaint of twenty individuals. The writers were sentenced to 3141 years and eight months' imprisonment, and the journals to 7,110,5000. fine.

FREE CONVICTS FOR NEW SOUTH WALES.—The Edinburgh, hired barque, dropped down the river on Monday to moorings opposite the Royal Arsenal, to receive on board convicts from the Warrior and Justitia convict hulks at Woolwich, who have preferred proceeding to New South Wales, where they will, on landing, obtain free tickets, with the opportunity of following any plan they may choose to adopt in that country for an honest subsistence, on condition that they do not return to this country again. Numbers of the convicts have volunteered. Two other vessels have been hired to convey convicts to the same destination, and are at present taking in stores at Deptford. A new series of regulations is to be adopted relative to the convicts who will remain in this country, and the alteration will take place at the commencement of the new year.

CHAPTER VI.

THEY GO INTO THE WIDE WORLD.

THE picture of the Madonna was finished, and was sent to the city for exhibition. Reinhard was annoyed at receiving the news that the Sub-Librarian had unwittingly betrayed who had been the model for the Madonna. An Englishman, who was at that time a resident in the capital, offered a certain sum for the picture, and Reinhard consented that he should have it on his own terms, because he did not wish to take his wife to the city, where the picture was, and also from another reason. The matter of fact side exists in all circumstances. Reinhard was in want of money to begin housekeeping with.

The Sub-Librarian took a house for Reinhard, and his sister put it in order for them. The Landlord of the Linden Tree was assailed with this news, in order that he might allow the marriage soon to take place. He let things take their course.

On the evening before the wedding, Lorle stood behind Bärbel and wept bitterly, because she was about to leave this faithful old servant. She complained that she should not know what to do when she got to the city; with that Bärbe said—

"I can't do it; I have promised him that I would not tell, but it is no manner of use. Do be quiet; Reinhard has been so long begging and plaguing me that I am now going with you to the city. Be cheerful, therefore; I shall stop as long with you as you will keep me."

Lorle hastened to Reinhard, and embraced him with inexpressible affection; by this means she helped to drive away the vexation which a letter he had just received from the Sub-Librarian had occasioned him. He had invited him, as his only friend, to the wedding, and the answer which he received declining it, and assigning, as a reason, that he was refused leave of absence, was at the same time full of extreme bitterness against Reinhard.

Lorle was married in her peasant's costume. When she came out of the church, she went up to her little chamber to put on her city dress. Here she remained for a long time praying, with many tears.

She rose from her knees, and called in Vroni to assist her in dressing; she did not put on any of her low silk dresses, but merely one of simple white muslin, made plain to the throat.

Every one looked with joy upon Lorle as she thus came down to them; her gait, every movement of her hand, all was as in the spirit of a sacred festivity.

The dinner was an exceedingly merry one. The musicians played many a lively tune, but the festivity had hardly reached its height, when, in a pause, the cracking of a whip was heard before the door; Reinhard and Lorle arose, and all the others did the same. Before the house stood the little carriage; all the luggage was carefully fastened on; the black horse was in the shafts, and Martin stood there with the reins in his hands.

Lorle never raised her eyes from the ground, as they crossed the court, as if there were everywhere something to detain her.

The wedding guests had gathered all about the little carriage, when up came Wendelin stumbling, and gave to Lorle a blackbird which he had caught, in a cage of his own making; Lorle, he said, must take it with her. They promised him that it should go with Bärbel, when she set off to the city.

The mother scarcely said a word to Lorle; she only kept stroking the handsome cloak which she had on, and asked, "Are you warm? Take care, for it gets cool towards evening, especially in driving."

Reinhard sprang into the carriage, and just when Reinhard was about to get in also, the Landlord gave him a heavy blow on the shoulders, and said, "Get along with you, you villain, you bad fellow, you dog, for taking my girl away with you!"

Those were only caresses, and Lorle could not help smiling amid her tears.

"Now, away with you! in Heaven's name, drive off," cried the Landlord; the muttering, who had stood looking on in silence, played a lively march, and away rolled the carriage.

"Come in, old woman," said the Landlord, putting his wife's arm within his, which was what he scarcely ever did: "come, we must now try to live contentedly alone. When first we were married we were long without children, and now our house is again without any. Come, we will have a dance, however. Musicians, strike up."

Lorle, in the meantime, was rapidly driving away. Just beyond the village sate Wendelin by the roadside, with his cage. As they drove up, he took out the bird and held it aloft towards them. Was it by his own free will, or was it accidental? The bird escaped out of his hand, and flew away. Wendelin, with the empty cage, returned home.

They raised swhile as the next town, and then drove on through the moonlight night in quiet rapture. Lorle, however, thought much about home; she would so like to have known whether they were now gone to bed, or whether they were dancing.

"Do you know the beautiful dance they played as we drove away from home?" asked Lorle from Reinhard. "To me it seems as if I still heard music."

Martin drove the young couple three days' journey. On the third evening, at the Three Kings, in Basle, he prepared to return home. Lorle felt deeply in her heart this separation from their own little carriage, from the black horse, and especially from Martin.

"Many thousand greetings to them all at home."

They now entered on the glorious scenery of the Alps. Reinhard had a willing auditor when he explained the changes and the beauties of nature, and their picturesque points of view. Lorle listened to him always with pleasure, even when she did not fully understand him. Sometimes, it is true, she would make a digression from the subject he spoke on, by remarking in what condition the potatoes were, or how entirely differently the oxen were yoked in this country to what they were at home; but, even when such observations cut in two, as it were, some enthusiastic explanation or other, he patiently went on with it afterwards.

CHAPTER VII.

BETWEEN HIGH WALLS.

How delighted was Lorle to find Bärbel already arrived at their house. They reached home in the evening, and Lorle took a survey of everything—yes, that was now her new world.

It was with an indescribable happiness that she that night arranged nearly all her marriage wealth in the closets and presses; and how much had not her mother unexpectedly added to it? The kind mother! The father, according to custom, had not omitted to send a cradle, and Lorle was as red as fire when she was aware of this; she was soon, however, again full of joy at the well-supplied flour chest, at the numerous jars of lard, and all other necessaries for a complete housekeeping, which Barbel had brought with her; she surveyed every pot and pan in the kitchen as now their own property. At first, Reinhard wished to put a stop to this, but afterwards he himself went with her through kitchen and chamber, and rejoiced in the happiness of his "dear little housewife."

Late in the night the two were still sitting together on the sofa, and Reinhard was telling her how he was the only child of his parents, whom he lost while he was yet very young; how he was brought up at a school; and afterwards, having had a quarrel with his guardian, had given up study, and devoted himself to art: how he had covered every bond, and Lad wandered freely about in the world.

"Never," said he, in conclusion, "have I known what a domestic hearth was; my deep yearnings are now fulfilled, with a heavy sacrifice, it is true; I have placed myself in service, but I would gladly give up a part of my artistic-life to have a home, a nest."

Lorle embraced him, and said, "You may well always be good and glad to be at home, you poor fellow, when the world has been so hard to you."

Lorle had on the first morning a contest with Barbel, because the good old woman only laid the table for two persons; no exhortations, and no beseechings that she would sit down and take her meals with them were of any avail, because she declared that it was not proper; nay, she even forbade Lorle to say anything to her husband on the subject, or else he would think her quite foolish.

At length the soup was on the table. Lorle said in silence her thanksgiving; Reinhard returned no thanks, and she again repeated her form of words instead of her husband.

A- they were thus sitting together, Reinhard asked, "Are these our own plates, Lorle?"

"Yes, to be sure. Why do you ask?"

"Hurrah!" shouted he; "then now when I break a plate, I shall not have to pay the host. That is mine—all are mine!" and with that he took a plate and threw it exultantly on the floor."

"It is one of a complete dozen," said Lorle.

"There are only ten in my dozen," exclaimed Reinhard, and threw down another; then he danced round the table singing with Lorle.

"You are a wild fellow," said Lorle, laying together the broken prices; "I will go and fetch some more."

"No, we shall eat with one another out of the dish," said he.

"Quite agreeable to me," returned Lorle.

Barbel came in, for she had heard the breakage, but Lorle told her that she need not that day bring any soup-plates, for they were going to eat out of the dish, and then they should do just as they did at home.

Reinhard introduced his wife to no one; she, indeed, needed nobody but himself; he was everything to her. He made his calls upon his superiors, his patrons, and his acquaintance; when any of these sought to flatter him upon his marriage, he simply thanked them, and turned the subject.

The business of the picture gallery was by no means settled, although an officer was already appointed for it. There was to take place this winter an extraordinary meeting of the Diet, and, which was best liked of all, it was to be merely summoned for financial purposes; to take into consideration, in case of the projected marriage, the money which would be required for the building a palace for the hereditary Prince; and, at the same time, the cost requisite for the building of a picture gallery was to be brought before them. The introduction of a law for the irrigation of meadows was to give the appearance of its being done for the public good.

Whilst Reinhard by these his visits obtained a comprehensive knowledge of the Court Guide, Lorle could not accustom herself to this city life. When everything in her house was made as clean and was arranged in as perfect order as possible, so that she had nothing at all left to do, Lorle prevailed upon Birbel to come and sit with her in the parlour. It required a great deal of persuasion to induce her to do this; because Barbel, who had lived in service more than thirty years, had her firm views—one may call them the laws—of a life of servitude, from which she very unwillingly departed. She always said to Lorle, "Of nobefolks are gentlefolks, and servants are servants." It was not till everything was locked up that she consented, and went and sate with her "Madame" in the parlour, but a long way from the window, that she might not be seen by the people of the houses opposite; and then, if Reinhard, who had a pass-key to the door, came in unexpectedly, she would hastily retreat to her own regions, and could only be induced to stay by the most urgent entreaty. She might be permitted to do something a hundred times which was inconsistent with her station, but she never would look upon it as her right, and it was necessary to persuade her afresh every time. She had a certain pride in not yielding to the confidential tone. Her principle was this: if I treat you with respect, you also must treat me with respect, not one day set me down to table with you, and the next thrust me behind the door.

Reinhard saw, however, in this stubfast line of conduct only the ceremonious manners of the peasant; and, after this, he wasted but few words on Barbel. In his absence, therefore, she sate with Lorle, busily e; steering. Their habitation, although in a new portion of the city, was yet in the third story.

"Oh!" lamented Lorle to Birbel one day, "it is so high up here, if there were a fire! and I am so sorry to think of my having to fetch water up from such a height, it is so uncomfortable. Now just look down; it makes one dizzy, and one can only see the people's hat crowns. These townspeople, however, are very cunning; they build up here in the air because it costs nothing, and thus they save ground. But I shall not let Reinhard have any rest till he buys his own house, where we may live by ourselves, and not as if in a barracks. Now, just look, we can only get a peep from between the houses to the left, and that is because they already began to lay foundations; in a year's time we shall see nothing but stone walls before us."

When Reinhard came home, he was generally affectionate and gentle; the more deeply he looked into the movements of the Governmental machine and the life of a placeman, the more he became aware of the fetters under which he was placed, and his brain was in a ferment; for which reason he felt the more keenly the quiet peace which pervaded the atmosphere of his own home; he inhaled deep draughts of it and wished to retain it continually to himself; for this, indeed, he had sacrificed the freedom of his own free life. Sometimes when he returned home thoughtful and with a troubled countenance, and Lorle would ask him the cause, he would reply, "Dear child, you never can or shall appreciate how wrangled and crooked things are in the world. And you must not always be asking me what is the matter when you see me thus thoughtful, for I have many things to think of. Now be cheerful, and rejoice that you do not know much."

"I will never again inquire about what you think I should not know," replied Lorle.

Reinhard now, for the first time, experienced truly the delights of domestic life, and he again began to work industriously. Work gives a home-feeling, even to lonely, strange rooms; how much more, then, to your own dwelling with "those whom we love?" In the little chamber towards the north, which he had now fitted up for a temporary painting-room, he set about the composition of his picture, "The New Song," which he had begun in the village. Lorle was often with him, because he had said, "I pray you to come often to me when I am at work: I do everything better when you are with me. Even, if I do not talk to you; if I don't seem to mind you, yet you are to me like pleasant music in the room; I do everything better because of it."

Lorle by no means regarded the world around her as an established thing, precisely because she was in ignorance of the usages on which so much depends.

Reinhard very soon gave up every attempt to introduce his wife into the sphere of art and education; neither had she any yearning after it: that which was not palpable had no interest for her. He, too, found himself in the midst of the whirlpool of what was to him ungenially new in the world. He entered into "society," as it is called, par excellence, in which all those who do not belong to it are regarded as a rabble, very much to be commiserated. In the barrenness peculiar to society, Reinhard, the adopted child, became a refreshing element. In the commencement, he regarded this frequenting the drawing-rooms as a part of the duties of his office; it never entered his mind how melancholy it was that Lorle should have to sit at home so much alone. The extraordinary meeting of the Diet was called. The Prince had often talked over with Reinhard how that the bel-étage of the centre of the new Palace should be adorned with the paintings of the country, which Reinhard was to paint in fresco; whilst upon the friese he was to represent the peculiar manners of the people, in which the figures were to be painted in the various costumes of the country. Reinhard was delighted to have such a work to execute, and which was sufficient for the person of a life. He put aside his picture of "The New Song," and made all kinds of designs, the examination of which furnished rich material for conversation, and Reinhard by this means was in many ways the centre of society. It, however, turned out in the end that the Chamber of Deputies, by a large majority, not only refused to grant the money for the new Palace, but also for the Picture Gallery, because the necessities of the country were so great that they could not make any grants for these purposes. By a majority of only two, was the requisite sum obtained for Reinhard's stipend, and for the preparation of the Picture Gallery, and that in a room above the Royal stables. In revenge for this, the Government refused to allow of any reform in the establishment for the Teachers of the People's Schools, which had been agreed to on the former meeting of the Diet. The consequence of these obstacles was to implant a deep dissatisfaction in the mind of Reinhard, to which he added the belief that the Chamber of Deputies was adverse to art, which had only 5 thaler in the Assessment for the Arts, and Reinhard lived without any political opinions; he now adopted them.

THE REMAINS OF MIRABEAU.—When, on the proposition of Marat, the commune of Paris decided that the remains of Mirabeau should be removed from the Pantheon, his ashes were not thrown to the wind, as has been wrongly stated; but a municipal officer caused the body to be buried without pomp and without honour, in a corner of the cemetery of Chamart, where it has since remained forgotten. It appears that the fact is proved by an authentic proces verbal. It is announced that the municipality of Paris has just ordered researches to be made in the cemetery of Chamart to discover the remains of the celebrated orator, and that a tomb will be afterwards erected to him in Père la Chaise.

THE LATE CHARGE AGAINST A NOBLEMAN.—A singular circumstance connected with the late charge against Lord W. Poulett has been published, viz. that on Sunday night, two days after the affair had taken place, the shopman (Allen), who had made a most rigid search for the slippers, dreamed that they had been taken away by his Lordship. Upon mentioning this circumstance the following morning, it was recollected that Lord W. Poulett had been seen to take up a slipper while in the shop. In consequence of this dream, the inquiry was set on foot, the result of which is already known.

A LAMENT FOR THE HEROES OF OLD CHRISTMAS TALES—GHOSTS.

BY ANGUS B. REACH.

WHAT choppings and changings we're making,
'Tis old fashioned now to drink Toasts;
There's no one I know who wears Hessian Boots,
And none who're believers in Ghosts.
True, you may dream of such rococo things
After supping on undersize pork;
But a genuine Ghost is as hard to be met
As a waggon 'twixt London and York!

Yet this was the time—the Christmas Time—
When, around the Christmas fire,
Such terrible stories we whispered all
Of phantoms shadowy grim and tall,
Who, instead of a paletot, wore a pall,
And death watches dirling on tick on the wall;
And goblins with eyes which would gleam and flash,
And skeletons sitting on chests of cash,
And departed ladies wan and pale
With hoop and brocade and farthingale,
Which rustled and waved, as, without ever banging
A door, they went out by the tapestry hanging.
And dozens of others, some of them lodging
In haunted houses grim and lone;
And some upon midnight commons trudging,
Where murderous deeds were long since done!

Where are they now? Pooh, pooh, sir,
Where is your last year's tin?
Where are they now? Fooh, pooh, ma'am,
Where is your year's pin?
Gone—all—gone—though, perhaps,
After all, 'tis a great relief
That pauper ghosts can manage
Neither in door nor out-door belief!

And yet it is not—I grieve to state
That our minds are so much improved of late:
Some folks believe in a pig-faced lady,
Some folks send letters to Joseph Ady—
Some folks suppose the "legitimate's" part,
And a handful will still pm their faith to High Art;
But, whatever the whimsey which rules the roast,
There's no one will own a belief in a ghost!

Then, are we not, in sooth,
An irreverend set of dogs,
To have never a spectre tale
For our burning Christmas logs?
To say to our patient friends,
"Come, pass on, Gentlemen, pass—
You really can't co-exist
With Chloroform, Steam, and Gas!"
Just think of a "haunted house"
In a newly run-up square—
Imagine a spirit of old
In a Cemetery taking the air.
Or think with what awkward noises
A cautious man they would dub,
Who had solemnly whispered it round,
"He had just seen a Ghost at the Club."

So let it be—pass from our startled sight,
Ye gaastly shadows, into utter night;
Cease to afflict the sick man's darkened room,
Gibber no longer o'er the moonlit tomb;
You cannot give us, and we would not crave,
Knowledge of aught beyond the severing grave:
Ours be the earth. ours, until crack of doom,
The morning sunlight as the midnight gloom;
Yours—a domain, by human eye unseen,
Till Death has bridged the gulph which lies between.

THE THESPIANS.

ADELPHI.

Possibly, one of the worst pieces we ever saw was produced at this house on Monday night, with the title of "The Pearl of the Ocean." We are sorry to pronounce such a decided opinion upon its demerits, for Mr. Webster's management of the Adelphi is liberal and spirited, and Mr. Webster has supported most of the pieces produced here with much spirit; but judgment must have been at fault somewhere, when it was first determined to lay out so large a sum of money on the mise en scene of so ineffective a production; for the manner in which it has been put upon the stage is most magnificent. Gorgeous dresses, suits of real glancing armour, elaborate machinery, and beautiful scenery, all combine to render the ensemble of the piece the nearest approach to the superb fairy spectacles of the Porte St. Martin that has been aimed at on our stage for some time; and had all these accessories been wedded to a cleverly written burlesque, a long and brilliant run might have been ensured. But moreover the attention of the audience was not fixed by some great effect, they evinced remarkable indifference to the action of the plot—which it strikes us must be founded upon a story called "The Little Mermaid" that appeared some months back in Bentley's Miscellany. We were sorry to see Miss Woolgar, Mr. Wright, Mr. Munyard, and Mr. Paul Bedford, struggling against so much heavy business. There was not a good part in the speeches: and Madame Celeste's appearance in a number of gorgeous costumes went for nothing. At the same time the character of the Mermaid, evident y meant to be the chief rôle, was not suited to her; indeed, we have seldom seen her in a more disadvantageous. Her aim is the pleasing, pantomime, and melo-dramatic. In parts requiring the exhibition of pathos or fascination, she entirely fails; hence, her appearance in a species of Albanian costume was as startling as it was unamusing.

But, while finding fault with the piece in itself, we must pay a well-deserved compliment to the beautiful manner in which it was mounted—of which we have before spoken. The scenery was by Messrs. Grieve, the armour by Masson, the dresses were dressed in the last act, appearing worth more than any sum lately spent upon the production of a play, not even excepting "Paulo Van Artevelde." And, certainly, the effect of the twelve young ladies, who successively appeared abreast down the stage, was very good; but, there was not, as in "Valsha," a sufficient motive for their appearance. An admirable scene, also, was the harbour, with the arrival of the galley bearing the Prince. In this a large ship came nearly up to the footlights, in the same manner as was once done in "Caerry and Fair Star." The piece commenced with some dissolving views, and ended with a galvanizing tableau of mermaids, warriors, and gaily-clad nobles, and presents, in a water palace.

"The Pearl of the Ocean" will attract the holiday folks, without a question; but something more than their attraction has been aimed at. Had it been brought out at any other time, we expect the return of the money lavished upon it would have been a matter of some doubt.

THE Pantomime at DRURY-LANE will be called, as we hinted, "Friar Rush; or, Harlequin and King Gold;" the opening being partly taken from a story that appeared in a book, entitled "Tales of other Days," which George Cruikshank illustrated some years back. The style is of the old school. An old Baron, with a name that appears utterly unpronounceable, not very well off, falls in love with a woodman's daughter. She has, however, a young lover, and this originates a contest between the fairies and their ally, Friar Rush, on one side, and King Gold and his power on the other, to win the girl for their respective favourites—the young lovers turning to Harlequin and Columbine and the comic business begins. The scenes contain the Port of Boulogne, the Brighton Horse, Vauxhall Gardens, a country inn, a magic bedroom, the open sea, and several shops, streets, and well-known buildings; and the Lion mania, the Stratford upon-Avon subscription, and other topics of the year are hit at.

The ADELPHI produces a somewhat novel entertainment—an Italian pantomime, in fourteen scenes, without a harlequin or clown, but supported principally by the comical Pierrot and Pierrette. Harlequin, in the sense of French pantomime, is regarded as a fairy, to whom the principal character. He is the successor of Dubureau in this line; and his action is singularly expressive. He will be very well seconded by Mr. Paul Bedford.

The LYCEUM burlesque, by Mr. Planché, is to be called "The Magic Branch," and will embrace the entire strength of the company.

At the HAYMARKET, "The World Underground," by Messrs. Lemon and Affcott, will bring forward Mrs. Keeley again in burlesque, in addition to the established favourites of the company.

Mr. Nelson Lee appears to split pantomimes from his brain by about the same process as Dumas writes romances. Donizetti operas, Mr. James novels, or Mr. Sockett jokes. At ASTLEY'S, the SURREY, and his own theatre, the STANDARD, Mr. Nelson supplied the pantomimes, as well as to the Birmingham Theatre Royal, Sheffield, the Liverpool, the Dublin, and the comic scenes at the OLYMPIC. In fact, were we to notice all, we might set up a "Nelson column" of our journal to commemorate his actions. The SURREY pantomime is called "Harlequin Battledore and Shuttlecock, or Trap, Bat, and Ball," and at ASTLEY'S, as we stated, the renowned Grande et Ecu Syntax will be shown in a new light, under the tormenting influence of the evil spirits, Stang and Firefly.

At the PRINCESS', "Old Father Time, or Harlequin and the Four Seasons," by Mr. Rodwell, is well spoken of in the coulisses; and will have the advantage of all his musical taste.

The OLYMPIC has put out a strong array of names in the bill prospectus, including that of Mr. Gustavus Brooke, the provincial tragedian, about whom great expectations are formed. Mr. Stuart, of the Haymarket, is also engaged, together with his daughter. Miss Laidlaw leaves the Lyceum, to be the Columbine the best, perhaps, in London. Mr. Spencer is at the head of the management; and provided this gentleman collects authors of acknowledged talent round him, and does not act his own plays, he may succeed.

COUNTRY NEWS.

SUNDERLAND ELECTION.—The nomination took place on Monday for a member to represent this borough in the room of Mr. David Barclay, resigned. The polling took place on Tuesday, and terminated in favour of the local candidate, Sir Hedworth Williamson, Bart., after a very keen contest. Both candidates were Radicals. The polling commenced at eight o'clock; at nine o'clock Sir H. Williamson headed his opponent by 76 votes, and continued to increase his lead until the close of the poll, when the numbers were, for—

Sir H. Williamson	..	..	..	..	725
Mr. W. A. Wilkinson	..	..	..	..	595
Majority for Sir H. Williamson					130

At the genera election in August last, Mr. Williamson polled 569 votes only.

WELSH ELECTION.—Two candidates are in the field, viz., Mr. R. C. Tudway, of Wells, on the Conservative interest; and Mr. W. G. Hayter, the new Judge Advocate General.

SOUTH LANCASHIRE ELECTION.—An election to supply the vacancy caused by the determination of the doubly-elected Hon. C. P. Villiers to act for Wolverhampton, was held on Monday, at ten o'clock, in the large room of the Horse and Jockey inn, Newton-in-the-Willows. Alexander Henry, Esq., a Liberal, was the only candidate. Mr. Cobden, who was received with loud applause, proposed Mr. Henry. Mr. Hathborne seconded the nomination. The address, customary on those occasions, having been delivered, the High Sheriff asked if there was any other candidate to propose, and no answer being returned, he declared, amidst loud cheers, that Alexander Henry had been duly elected. Mr. Henry returned thanks. W. Brown, Esq., M.P., addressed a few words to the audience, and, after a vote of thanks to the high sheriff, the proceedings terminated.

INCENDIARY FIRES.—Repeated outrages of this nature have been committed of late throughout the country. On Sunday afternoon, the 12th inst., about two o'clock, a fire was discovered breaking out in a large wheat straw stack in the yard of Mr. Edward Staples, Exning (Cambridgeshire), which soon communicated to three wheat and two barley stacks, one large wheat straw, and one large straw stack, which were entirely consumed. The buildings escaped, although the doors and frames were burnt, and damage done to the slating. The quantity of wheat consumed was from 300 to 400 coombs, about 500 coombs of barley, and the straw from about 400 coombs more of wheat and barley. The Aylesbury News says that seldom a morning comes without the report of a fire having taken place during the preceding night, and that the greatest alarm reigns amongst the farmers in consequence.

CHARING-CROSS HOSPITAL, London, West Strand, near Charing-cross.

TREASURERS—Very Rev. G. H. Bowyer, Esq., Temple-street; and A. M. Drummond, Esq., 49 Charing-cross

The Committee earnestly SOLICIT the AID of the Affluent for this HOSPITAL, which has experienced for several months a serious diminution of its income, in consequence of the pressing claims of distress in other parts of the kingdom, although the number of sick applicants has increased, and that time from 1000 to 6000 more than at any former similar period.

So important to the surrounding poor is the continuance of its welfare and support, that the Committee venture to make this appeal on its behalf, and they indulge the hope, now that the more remote claims has been befriended, that the great suffering which exists in the Metropolis, and wants is best relieved by public hospitals, may receive the consideration of the Benevolent, and this Hospital, which confers such inestimable and wide extended benefits upon the sick and destitute, may be sustained, to enable the Committee to extend its useful operations.

Subscriptions are most thankfully received by the Committee, Treasurers, and Secretary, at the Hospital; and by Messrs. Drummonds, 49, Charing-cross; Messrs. Coutts, 59, Strand; Messrs. Hoare, 37, Fleet street; and by the neighbouring Bankers.

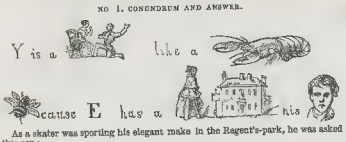
NO 1. CONUNDRUM AND ANSWER.



As a skater was sporting his elegant make in the Regent's-park, he was asked this con:—

"Why is this sheet of ice like a Canada lake?" D'ye give it up?"—

Because it's the lake you're on (Lake Huron).

2. Once person tells another that he can put something into his right hand, which it is impossible the other can put in his left. How is this to be done?

3. Which are the only two words in the English language wherein the five vowels follow each other in their proper order?

ANSWER: ABSTEMIOUS AND FACETIOUS.

4. How must a circle be drawn round a person placed in the centre of a room, so that he will not be able to jump out of it, though his legs should be free?

5. CONUNDRUM AND ANSWER.

Easily Tired.—Produce a small stick, and tell some person present that he will be completely tired before he has carried it out of the room. If he deny your assertion take a penknife, and having cut with it a small piece the size of a grain of corn, desire him to take that out first; upon his return, give him a similar piece, and so on, until he confesses himself tired. This will soon be the case, as it is evident at he rate you can cut up the stick it will take him some months to carry it out of the room.

PICTURE PROVERBS.

"GREAT CRY AND LITTLE WOOL."

"A FRIEND IN NEED IS A FRIEND INDEED."

"AS A MAN MAKES HIS BED, SO MUST HE LIE ON IT." "PAY AS YOU GO."

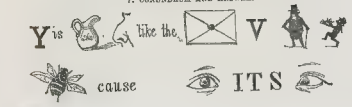
"PRAISE THE SEA, BUT KEEP ON LAND."

"IT'S NOT THE GAY COAT MAKES THE GENTLEMAN."

"ALL IS FISH THAT COMES TO THE NET."

6. What is that which never was seen, felt, nor heard; never was, and never will be, and yet has a name?

7. CONUNDRUM AND ANSWER.



The Dancing Pea.—Take a piece of tobacco-pipe, break it off even at the end, and with a knife or file work the hole rather larger, so that there may be a little hollow for the pea (which should be perfectly round) to rest in. Place the other end of the pipe in your mouth, hold your head back, and, keeping the pipe quite perpendicular, commence blowing gently, and the pea will dance about, leaping up sometimes to the height of two or three inches.

CONS UPON CATS.

8. WHAT IS MOST LIKE

A CAT LOOKING OUT OF WINDOW?

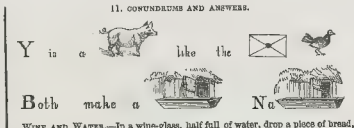
9. WHY IS

A CAT STANDING ON ITS HIND LEGS, LIKE THE FALLS OF NIAGARA?

10. My First's a little busy thing
My Second ladies do,
Impelled by love their flight to wing
My Whole—say, what are you?
An animal of swiftest pace,
Endowed with beauty, strength, and grace.

10. What is that which is above all human imperfections, and yet shelters the weakest and wickedest, as well as the wisest of mankind?

11. CONUNDRUMS AND ANSWERS.



Wine and Water.—In a wine-glass, half full of water, drop a piece of bread, about as big as the top of your finger. Gently pour some wine upon it, and the two liquids will continue separate, the water remaining at the bottom of the glass and the wine floating on its surface.

12. Why is a child with a cold in its head like a stormy day in winter

13. When is a man thinner than a lath?

14. CONUNDRUM AND ANSWER.

PICTURE PROVERBS.

"ALL ARE NOT HUNTERS THAT BLOW THE HORN."

"A CONTENTED MIND IS A CONTINUAL FEAST."

"BETTER LATE THAN NEVER."

"ANYTHING FOR A QUIET LIFE."

"HE IS WISE WHO SPEAKS LITTLE."

15. Four things there are, all of a height
One of them crossed, the rest upright:
Take three away, and you will find
Exactly ten remain behind;
But, if you cut the four in twain,
You'll find one half doth eight contain.

16. I went to a wood and got it—I sat down to look for it, and brought it home because I could not find it. What was this wonderful thing?

17. Pray, youngsters who in witty things delight,
Say what's invisible, yet never out of sight?

18. How should a candle be placed so that every person shall see it except one, although he shall not be blindfolded or prevented from examining every part of the room, neither shall the candle be hidden?

SNAP DRAGON.

19. CONUNDRUM AND ANSWER.

20. Who swallowed a street, and where?

21. When does a pieman shed scalding tears?

22. Why is learning like

"A BOWL OF PUNCH."

23. What word is that which is made shorter by adding another syllable to it?

24. I'll throw an egg against a wall,
And it shall neither break nor fall!
How is this?

25. What snuff-taker is that whose box gets fuller the more snuff he takes?

26. CONUNDRUM AND ANSWER.

entitled to be ranked as great navigators

Answer.—Because they are always

CROSSING THE LINE.

26. Why is a melancholy young lady the pleasantest of all companions?

27. Why are fish in a thriving state like fish made to imitate them?

28. Who was the first whistler, and what tune did he whistle?

29. CONUNDRUM AND ANSWER.

30. When was the King of Prussia the longest man living?

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 296.—Vol. XI.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, JANUARY 1, 1848. [Sixpence.

THE OLD YEAR.

THE opening of a new year, and the close of an old one, has always been a period of twofold interest. The "two-headed" Janus of the ancients was but a symbol of the feeling that makes men, when crossing one of the great boundaries of time, look forward to the future, and back on the past—one the possession of memory, the other the domain of hope. Before we pass the brief space during which experience and expectation are so mingled, it may be seasonable to throw a rapid glance over the course we have traversed; not with any idea that much more use will be made of our experience—some of it purchased by suffering—than is the practice of nations to do. It is a happy provision of nature that nothing is so soon forgotten as calamity.

The historian of the departed year, 1847, will assuredly not class it among the most fortunate of the children of Time. It was much the reverse. Its character makes it impossible to speak well of it; and the common-places of poetry, which are so often strewed like flowers over the grave of the past, are most of them falsified. It was not glorious, nor festive, nor joyous—it was not lucky, nor rich. There is no one class to which it brought anything but increased difficulty and dilemma. To statesmen it gave unusual anxiety; it did not convert the famine of its predecessor into plenty; it only so far diminished the peril, that our deprivation was scarcity, not absolute want. Merchants will mark it with a black stone in their calendar; for was it not an awful period in the City? Money "tight," discount impossible, and commercial crashes coming thick and fast on each other, how can the mercantile mind look back on 1847 save with a shudder? Unpleasant is its reminiscence in Downing-street, disagreeable in the Bank Parlour, unwelcome on 'Change, auspicious nowhere. There will be a common consent among mankind to forget it as soon as possible.

Yet, as a time of "adversity," it may have its "uses." The difficulties it brought with it did not arise without cause. Within the past months we have had concentrated the expiation of a long period of excess. The reaction that follows a time of feverish speculation cannot be escaped; and in England especially, is no new occurrence. It only proves how little men profit by experience collectively, and how soon they forget former misfortunes. To the South Sea bubble, the era of Mexican and Peruvian mines, the period of foreign loans, when Englishmen were insanely credulous, "pouring their treasure into foreign laps," with a recklessness almost inconceivable, may now be added the Railway mania, and the punishment with which it was visited in 1847.

There is yet another lesson to be derived from our troubles

another sparkle from the "jewel" contained in what is else so repulsive. For our gold we have got something besides corn—the knowledge that there is a power in nations to aid each other. The time has been when a calamity in one country would have been seized as the best opportunity for stacking it; now we have drawn support both from Russia and America. It is something in misfortune to know that help is possible of attainment even on the selfish condition of paying for it.

Politically, the past year leaves no reputation behind it, good or bad. It has been mostly occupied by merely defensive measures against social perils. The short session of a month, the first sitting of the new Parliament, was the most remarkable part of the whole year. The event most pregnant in results was the death of O'Connell; with him fell a whole system, for he left none able to continue his work. He will be long imitated, but the resemblance is in form only; the power is gone.

A darker shadow has been thrown over the close of the year by the increase of disease, and the appearance in the distance of that scourge, the Cholera. But there is activity among us in the direction of sanatory precautions, and we must not despair. As if the misfortunes of the year had infected our minds with gloom, we have been alarming ourselves with ideas of the possibility of invasion—a notion that only requires examination to be proved unfounded. Let us hope that lengthening days and brighter skies may inspire more cheerfulness. The past year has not done much to inspire it; we take, therefore, a willing leave of him, hoping better things of 1848—to whom be welcome!

FRESCOES IN THE NEW HOUSE OF LORDS.

EDWARD THE THIRD CONFERRING THE ORDER OF THE GARTER ON EDWARD THE BLACK PRINCE.

PAINTED BY C. W. COPE, A.R.A.

In this elaborate and striking Fresco, the Institution, in 1344, of the Order of the Garter, the noblest of the English Orders of Knighthood, is portrayed.

The chivalrous Edward the Third is represented in full robes, standing on the steps of his throne, grasping the hand of his son, "the sable warrior," around whose leg an attendant Noble is buckling the symbol of knightly brotherhood. By the side of the King stands his Consort Philippa, watching the ceremonial of the investiture of her eldest son, with an expression of deep interest. The Black Prince is in panoply of steel, and wears his surcoat, whilst round his brows a wreath is twined; a similar wreath decorating the brows of a bearded warrior, who stands behind the Prince. At the foot of the steps of the throne is a mingled crowd of warriors and nobles, beholding the novel ceremony with great admiration; whilst, in a gallery behind the King and Queen, are many demoiselles, adding, by their bright looks, to the interest of the scene; whilst trumpeters are proclaiming, by loud blasts on their instruments, that the young Prince is receiving the meed of his valour. The accessories in this beautiful and highly interesting Fresco are most skilfully managed, and evince great antiquarian knowledge, as well as high artistic skill in treatment.

THE SPIRIT OF RELIGION.

PAINTED BY J. C. HORSLEY.

This beautiful Fresco excites great admiration, from the exquisite sentiment pervading the design, and its great sweetness of execution. In the foreground are represented, bowing in adoration to the Cross, king, b shop, priest, learned men, and warrior; whilst a mother is teaching her young child prayer. The king has put off his crown, the bishop his mitre, and laid aside his crosier; and the warrior is sheathing his sword, in adoration of the King of Kings; and, in a group in the distant part of the composition, maidens are distributing food and raiment, in exemplification of the divine precepts of Charity; and thus the Fresco illustrates the three great Christian virtues—Faith, Hope, and Charity.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

On Tuesday last his Majesty Louis Philippe opened the Legislative Chambers in person, and delivered a speech from the throne, of the ordinary incommunicative and uninteresting character of such productions. Among the few measures promised in it are two, for reducing the price of salt and the postage on letters—in both these respects France being a century behind the standard expected in a constitutional country. The weakness and unfavourable omen for the display with which the ceremony of opening the Chambers is accompanied. It snowed heavily, and all wore a most bleak and wintry aspect.

The King's Speech produced an unfavourable impression on the Bourse.

The Bank of France had declared a dividend of 93f. for the second half year of 1847.

M. Guizot has despatched a copy of a note to the Cabinets of London, Vienna, Berlin, and St. Petersburgh, in reply to the refusal of the Helvetic Diet to accept the mediation of those Powers, in which he states that the Diet having destroyed the Federal pact, the Powers regarded themselves as released from the obligations they incurred on themselves by the treaties of the year 1815.

Count Kisseleff, Charge d'Affaires ad interim of Russia in Paris, has received official notice of his appointment as Envoy Extraordinary, the Emperor not wishing to accredit an Ambassador in that country to Mexico.

A Grand Reform dinner took place at Rouen, on the 26th instant, at which 1800 persons were present. Among them were 90 Deputies, 1,400 electors, and nearly 400 citizens unable to seate in the Chamber.

M. Grand (de l'Ain), Vice-President of the Council of State, and at one time Minister of Public Instruction and Keeper of the Seals, died at Paris on Monday morning. He was a Peer of France.

Count Dubois, a distinguished man under the Empire, and for some time Prefect of Police, died on Saturday at his residence in Paris, having attained the age of 96 years.

SPAIN.

There are rumours of serious dissensions in the Cabinet, and that General Narvaez has threatened to make his resignation. There is also much squabbling at the Palace. The Governor, the Marquis of Miraflores, has been so severe in his regulations, that several of the household, with the approbation of the Queen, have protested against them.

Ministers are said not to agree with regard to the expediency of impeaching the Salamanca Cabinet, and the knowledge of that fact gave rise to reports of a Ministerial crisis. The estimates for 1848 were to be presented to the Cortes or Deputies on the 22d. General Ramon Solano had assumed the post of Governor of Madrid ad interim.

The Gazette publishes a Royal decree, establishing a Captaincy-General in the Spanish possessions along the Mediterranean coast of Africa, and appointing to that post General Ros de Olano. General Antonio Ordonez, the present Governor of Ceuta, was named Deputy Captain General, and General Ignacio Chacon, Governor of Melilla.

The Senate was still discussing the authorization demanded by Ministers to collect the taxes until the close of the year, and the Chamber of Deputies had not yet voted the project of law relative to the levy of 25,000 men.

ITALY.

The Roman Consulta has terminated its internal regulations, and the Pope appears inclined to sanction them. His Holiness held a Consistory on the 17th, at which twenty Spanish Archbishops and Bishops were appointed. In his address to the Assembly, Pius IX. expressed satisfaction at the favourable turn assumed by the ecclesiastical affairs of Spain and Russia, but deeply lamented the fate of the Catholics of Switzerland.

The Diario di Roma announces officially that the question of Ferrara has been settled, as far as regards the fatal occupation of the town by the Austrian troops, who are to return to the fortress: but the question of right is still left in suspense, the Austrian Cabinet refusing to admit that it has not a full right to occupy Ferrara according to the treaties of 1815 and of Vienna. It does not appear, however, that up to the 20th ult. any order had been received by the Austrian Commandant at Ferrara to evacuate the town.

Letters from Naples bring out to the morning of the 18th, and salled towards the Gulf of Spezzia. Sir W. Parker, who had returned from Rome, was about, it was said, to proceed to Genoa in a steamer, and from thence to go with his squadron to Malta.

The kingdom of Naples is described to be in the greatest ferment. The Neapolitan Government having ordered some refugees from other states to quit Naples, public feeling became so excited that the troops were called.

The insurgents of Calabria, commanded by Baron Longobucco, have penetrated into the provinces of Cosenza, Reggio and the Abruzzi.

The Duke of Lucca left Genoa on the 19th ult., on receiving despatches announcing the death of the Archduchess Maria Louisa.

The Chevalier Angelo Scipior, Count Pasqualino, died at Florence on the 18th.

The Marquis Marquerito of Turin, of the 21st present, has addressed a letter to Count Cesar Balbo and other eminent Piedmontese, intended to be presented to the King of the Two Sicilies, praying him to accede to the policy of the other Italian Princes, and to introduce into his Kingdom those reforms which the present age imperiously demands.

PRUSSIA.

THE POLISH TRIALS. The King has commuted the sentence of death pronounced upon Kosinski, one of the most prominent leaders in the late insurrection, to imprisonment, for what term is not mentioned. It is probable that a similar commutation will take place respecting all the other prisoners now under sentence of death.

AUSTRIA.

The Cabinet has resolved on reforming the army in Italy to such an extent, that there shall be a disposable force there of at least 40,000 men who can be marched to any point without weakening the garrisons. A notification has been sent to all the great Powers, with an assurance that it is only a measure of precaution for the security of the Austrian possessions in Italy; but the general belief is that the increase of the force in Italy is intended chiefly as a menace to Switzerland.

SWITZERLAND.

The Helvetic Diet held a meeting on the 24th ult., at which it was agreed to grant a delay of five years to the Canton of Unterwalden to pay its share of the expenses of the war. The hospitable streets of the Grand St. Bernard, rumoured with spoliation by the Radical party, had abandoned their convent, and retired to the Sardinian territory.

The Neufchâtel Government have, since the rejection of their former unsatisfactory tender of payment, given bills upon Paris for the 300,000f. which have been received by the Vorort.

The ex-President of the Council of War of the Sonderbund arrived on the 18th at Bezen (Austria), from Verona, accompanied by his wife and two children.

THE WEST INDIES

By the Royal Mail Steam-packet Company's ship Trent, Sturdie commander, lately arrived, we learn that the West India Islands generally were healthy, and the weather genial.

The steamer encountered stormy weather on her passage home.

Amongst other goods she brings on freight bars of silver, value sterling, £18703; dollars, on mercantile account, 17,000; casks of coffee, 33; bales of sarsaparilla, 177; and 52 packages of sundries.

THE UNITED STATES.

Advices by the Astherton packet-ship, which arrived in Liverpool on Thursday morning, bring President Polk's Message to the United States Congress, delivered on Wednesday, the 7th ult. The document is, as usual, exceedingly lengthy. The President states that with all the world except Mexico their intercourse continues to be of an amicable character. About two-thirds of the message is then devoted to the subject of their war with Mexico; the origin, causes, and history of which, as understood by the President, are recapitulated.

The doctrine of no territory the Republic covets—the doctrine of no indemnity, and a treaty on such terms will never be sanctioned by him. He is persuaded that the best means of vindicating the national honour and interest, and of bringing the war to a close, will be to prosecute it with increased energy and power in the vitals of the enemy's country; and he recommends that authority be given by Congr ss to raise an additional regular force, and to accept the services of an additional number of volunteers for the service in Mexico.

A glance is then given at the state of relations with Brazil, Peru, and China. Congress are recommended to establish tribunals to try and punish crimes, and to exercise civil jurisdiction in China. Treaties with the Sublime Porte, Persia, Tunis, and Morocco, require the legislation of Congress. The opening of diplomatic relations with the Pope of Rome is recommended, and Chargés d'Affaires are to be appointed to the Republics of Bolivia, Guatemala, and Ecuador. With respect to the national revenue the amount was as follows:—

	Dollars
From customs	23,747,865
From public lands	2,498,338
Miscellaneous..	100,570
Total	26,346,769

The expenditures during the same period, exclusive of payment of 1, 27,082 dollars public debt and interest were .. 24,724,695
On the 1st ult., the amount of the public debt, which includes Treasury notes, was 45,635,559

The net revenues from customs during the year ending on the 1st of December, 1847, being one year since the operation of the new tariff, is estimated at 31,000,000 dollars—an increase of more than 8,500,000 over the amount received the year previous. The operation of the new tariff is considered by the President highly beneficial to the country, and not injurious to the manufacturer. The amount of specie imported during the last fiscal year was 24,121,289 dollars, of which there was retained in the country 22,276,170 dollars. The amount of gold and silver coin now in circulation in the country is larger than at any former period. The coinage at the mint and branches last year has exceeded twenty millions of dollars.

If the war with Mexico continue until June 30, 1849, a loan for the next year will be wanted for twenty and a half millions, in addition to eighteen millions, required for the remainder of the present and for the next fiscal year. A war duty on tea and coffee is urgently recommended.

The establishment of a territorial Government in Oregon is recommended; also grants of public lands to emigrants to that territory.

The President closes his Message by calling attention to the admonitions of Washington, respecting the dangers of sectional parties and geographical discriminations.

MEXICO.

Letters from Queretaro announce that Congress was organised on the 2nd November. Senor D. Jose Maria Gedoy was elected President of Congress, and Senor D. Jose Maria Hernandez, Vice-President. Both of these are spoken of as being favourable to peace.

In the four days previous to the 17th November, between 2000 and 3000 men landed at Vera Cruz to reinforce the American army. General Butler was expected to start for the capital with at least 6000 men under his command.

Nothing positive of the whereabouts of Santa Anna is known; it is surmised he is in the neighbourhood of Vera Cruz, watching an opportunity to slip off in the British steamer, or some other foreign vessel. A revolution had broken out at Guadalaxara in favour of the election of Farias to the Presidency. An engagement ensued between the troops and a mob, the latter of whom, it is said, Arrudia, and many others of Farias' party, were killed. Parades is at Tulancingo, and has openly pronounced in favour of monarchy, seconded by the garrison of Mazatlan.

SOUTH AMERICAN STATES

THE EQUATOR.—Don Vicente Roca, President of the Republic of the Equator, opened the session of the Legislative Chambers, on the 15th September, with a message which dwells at some length on the projects of General Flores to invade the Republic at the head of an armed force, and of the measures which the Government had taken to oppose him. The President said, that, as the principles of Flores had been enumerated in a Spanish port, the Government had demanded explanations from the Spanish agent in the Republic. That individual denied the participation of his G vernment; but, some time after, more than one striking character occurred, he thought right to demand his passports. At present, all dangers of a civil war had ceased, and commerce was on the increase.

THE BRAZILS

Advices to the 18th ult. have arrived from Rio de Janeiro by the Crane packet. The blockade of the River Plate on the part of the French squadron continued to be purely nominal, vessels passing up and down without any interference or obstruction. General Fructuoso Rivera, who had been banished to St. Catharine's for intriguing with Flores, had arrived at Monte Video, and was to leave Rio de Janeiro, about eight days before the Crane sailed, in the French brig-of-war Atalcante.

The news of commercial depression in England, which had been taken out by the Crane, put quite a stop to business, for the moment, at Rio de Janeiro; confidence had, however, returned, and the course of exchange maintained its former position.

A WHOLE MEDICAL STAFF ANÆSTHETICISED.—At Taunton Hospital, as a patient was lately undergoing amputation of a limb, while influenced by chloroform, the nurse let fall the bottle containing the chloroform, which caused a rapid its sanniferous effects over the operators, and some time elapsed before they recovered from their partial insensibility

PROVIDENTIAL ESCAPE OF A MAIL TRAIN. A DRUNKEN ENGINE DRIVER AND FIREMAN.—On Monday, at the New Bailey, Manchester, two men, named Wm. Hatfield and Mark Cregg, the former as engine driver and the latter a fireman in the employ of the London and North Western Railway Company, were brought up before Mr. Trafford, the stipendiary magistrate, and Captain Whitaker, charged with drunkenness and gross negligence in the discharge of their duty. It appeared that the prisoners had charge of the night mail train from Liverpool to London on Saturday. The number of carriages and passengers was not stated, but the pointsman at the Warrington Junction being at his post waiting for the train was surprised to observe that it had not arrived. He had been preparing to turn the points in order to shunt the train on to the Warrington junction; but as the train did not diminish its speed, but rather increased as it approached, he considered that there was imminent danger, if he should turn the points, fortunately determined upon letting the train take its course, and not turning them—a wise exercise of judgment—for, in consequence of the acuteness of the curve at the junction, the slightest deviation from the rate at which the train was proceeding—not less than forty miles an hour—nothing could have otherwise prevented the train from being overturned, and a frightful sacrifice of human life ensuing. Mentioning his apprehensions to the engine-driver and fireman, he was answered by them with a laugh, and they kept on their course. Finding this to be the case, he, at very considerable risk, passed over from carriage to carriage, till he reached the engine, where he found both the prisoners lying drunk, and apparently insensible from the effects of liquor. They resisted for some time all his efforts to stop the train, until they were near to Patricroft, where he at length succeeded in stopping it, just before it reached the station. Evidence of similar drunkenness on the part of the prisoners was adduced, and, in each case, there was an almost miraculous escape; for at the station on the same line as that on which the mail train was running was another train, containing a number of passengers, who, owing to the timely arrest of the first, escaped from the consequences of a dreadful collision. The prisoners were, of course, immediately given into custody and committed to the New Bailey prison, while other summonses being obtained against the engine-driver and fireman of the Warrington Junction. After some consultation, the Bench appeared to be of opinion that some negligence had been exhibited by the pointsman at the Junction, or he must would not have been allowed to have left there while under the influence of intoxication, sentenced both prisoners to two months' hard labour.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT WINDSOR.

On Christmas morning, the Queen and Prince Albert walked early in the pleasure grounds of the Castle. The Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, the Princess Royal, the Princess Alice, and the Princess Helena took airings in the course of the day. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, the Ladies and Gentlemen in Waiting, and the domestic household attended divine service in the private chapel of the Castle. The Hon. and Rev. C. L. Courtenay officiated. The Royal dinner party included the Duchess of Kent, Viscount Canning, the Lady in Waiting of the Duchess of Kent, the Dowager Lady and the Hon. Miss Lyttelton, Baroness de Speth, Lady Augusta Bruce, Mr. and Mrs. Anson, Colonel and Mrs. Phipps, Sir George and Lady Couper, General Wemyss, Dr. Meyer, and Mr. Glover. Captain A. Gordon had the honour of joining the Royal circle after dinner.

On Sunday morning, the Queen and Prince Albert enjoyed their accustomed walk. The Royal Family took walking and pony exercise on the Eastern Terrace and Slopes. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, the Ladies and Gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended divine service in the private chapel. The Hon. and Rev. C. L. Courtenay officiated.

On Monday morning, Prince Albert enjoyed the sport of shooting. His Royal Highness was accompanied by Viscount Canning, and was attended by Lord Waterpark, Lieutenant-Colonel Hon. A. N. Hood, Colonel Hon. C. B. Phipps, General Bowles, and Colonel Bouverie. The Royal dinner party at the Castle this evening included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, his Excellency the Duke de Broglie, the Lady in Waiting of the Duchess of Kent, Baroness de Speth, the Marquis and Marchioness of Abercorn, Lady Mary Howard, Mrs. Everard Bouverie, Viscount Canning, and Viscount Palmerston.

On Tuesday evening, the Royal dinner party at the Castle included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Duke and Duchess of Victoria, the Marquis and Marchioness of Abercorn, the Lady in Waiting of the Duchess of Kent, the Baroness de Speth, Viscount Palmerston, Viscount Canning, Lady Mary Howard, Colonel Wylde, and Dr. Meyer.

On Wednesday, the Duke and Duchess of Victoria, Viscount Palmerston, Viscount Canning, and Colonel Wylde, took their departure from the Castle. The Royal dinner-party at the Castle, in the evening, included the Marquis and Marchioness of Abercorn, and the Rev. Lord Wrottesley Russell.

CHRISTMAS FESTIVITIES AT WINDSOR.—The Christmas holidays have been observed at Court with princely festivities. The Royal table on Christmas night was laden with a magnificent display of viands both recherche and substantial, set up with infinite taste and splendour. The noble baron of beef—that standing dish at all English high festivals—was there in all its glory; as well as the "boar's head, crested with bays and rosemary." And the sideboards were surmounted with stately "Christmas trees," glittering with pendant bonbons, &c. At the conclusion of the banquet, the Queen, accompanied by her Royal and distinguished guests, returned to the Throne Room, where tea and coffee were served. In this apartment were five trees, between seven and eight feet high, placed in ornamented stands; the trees being in imitation of fir, and the leaves formed to resemble snow. On suspended from the branches were hundreds of elaborately ornamented baskets, boxes, &c., for presentation as Christmas gifts. Each of these minor trees was brilliantly illuminated with upwards of 80 wax lights. Mr. M'Kay, her Majesty's confectioner, was in attendance, and performed at the commencement of the banquet, marching round the room as soon as the company had taken their seats at table, playing favourite Scotch airs. The Queen's private band, under the leadership of Mr. Anderson, performed a concert in the evening in the Red Drawing Room, including the following compositions:—Overture, Swiss Family; Selections, "Joseph;" Waltzes, Lanner's; Selections, Meyerbeer.

NEW YEAR'S GIFTS.—Her Majesty has commanded that, on the morning of New Year's Day, a liberal quantity of provisions be given away to nearly 500 poor families residing in the parishes of Windsor and Clewer.

HER MAJESTY'S ACCOUCHEMENT. The services of MRS. LILLEY, as her Majesty's monthly nurse, have been again retained. The interesting event, it is expected, will not take place before the latter end of March or beginning of April. Her Majesty will be confined at Buckingham Palace. Shortly after the Christmas holidays the Court will visit Claremont for a few days. Her Majesty will afterwards return to Windsor, and remain at the Castle until the end of February or beginning of March, when the Court will remove to Buckingham Palace.

THE QUEEN DOWAGER. The latest accounts from her Majesty the Queen Dowager, at Madeira, are of the most favourable description in every respect. Her Majesty is not forgetful of home duties though so far away. On Christmas-Day nearly a thousand families, in the parish of Hampton and its vicinity, were regaled with a plentiful supply of beef and beer on their Christmas dinner, by her Majesty's munificence. The Royal bounty, in this and various articles of warm winter clothing, was distributed by the vicar of the parish.

IRELAND.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—His Lordship still continues very ill.

ASSISTANT BARRISTER OF LOUTH. Mr. Robert Andrews has received the appointment of Assistant Barrister for the county of Louth; but as this county is on his own circuit, he will exchange with some other barrister before the next Quarter Sessions.

PROCLAMATIONS UNDER THE ACT FOR THE PREVENTION OF CRIME. The Lord Lieutenant in Council has issued proclamations, declaring that the Act for the Prevention of Crime and Outrage in Ireland shall be in force from and after the 29th December, in the counties of Limerick and Tipperary, and in certain baronies of the counties of Waterford, King's County, Roscommon, Leitrim, Cavan, and Longford. A proclamation has also been issued, extending the Act to the barony of Orrery and Kilmore, county of Cork.

Notifications have also been issued from the Lord Lieutenant, signed by the Chief Secretary, Sir William Somerville, appointing, by warrant of his Excellency under the Act, officers to grant licenses for the possession or carrying of arms in the proclaimed districts.

Dr. Slattery, Archbishop of Cashel, has addressed a short letter to the Earl of Clarendon on the rapidity with which the Coercion Act has been brought into execution. The Archbishop places it as a matter beyond the hardiness of the law which should save the Poor Amendment Act—and the rapidity of that which tends to destroy. In conclusion, he observes:—"Your Excellency has admitted, in your answer to the memorial of the Catholic Bishops, that the preservation of human life was the sacred and paramount duty of Government; and shall it be always true that in Ireland there is to be one law for the rich and another for the poor?"

THE REV. MR. D'ARCY, P.P., of Loughmore (Ireland), gave an energetic exhortation at the altar on Sunday last, denouncing the armed gang who attacked the house of Mr Dea. Ryan.

THREATENING NOTICES. The Tipperary Vindicator, a Conservative journal, contains the subjoined extraordinary announcement:—"We have the following notice, a copy of which has been received by the parish priest of Mitchelstown, and their Roman Catholic curate, in the 'Weekly Register' of the Queen's county, exhibits a truly alarming state of society. The notice was posted in Dublin, on the 14th instant:—'December 15, 1847. Rev Sir I am directed to enclose you a copy of this resolution of a body of Protestants:—'Resolved: That, since we perceive the Government so backward in defending the lives of its present Protestant landlords, tenants, and clergymen, we do form ourselves into a body, and swear by a crucified Christ, that for the life of every Protestant landlord, tenant, or clergyman, we will take the life of the parish priest of that parish where the deed was committed, and this we swear to perform by the truth of the Gospel, throughout all the counties in Ireland; we being determined to see what effect making a few parishes second will have.—Yours, &c. Patrick Fitzpatrick, parish clerk.' We would request you to make this known also to your curate, Rev. John M'Mahon.'" The same journal has an article highly lauding the Rev. Michael O'Connor, parish priest of Cork, for his spirited conduct in denouncing the threatening notice against Sir Charles Coote, and his exertions during many years to preserve tranquillity. It is stated that Sir Charles Coote and his family are about to leave the country.

THE late severe affair in the somewhat unexpected decision of limiting the holding of the Special Commission to the counties of Limerick, Clare, and Tipperary, thereby excluding the populous county of Roscommon, the worst county some of the worst barbarities that have disgraced the kingdom during the last few months. Although there are several persons in custody charged with the murders of Major Mahon and Mr. Lloyd, the evidence is not yet sufficiently extensive to warrant the extension of the Commission to that county. It is as yet doubtful whether the South Riding of Tipperary will be included in the Commission.

THE LATE ARREST OF HONOUR AT CORK.—We have received a letter from Mr. Robert Hardy, of Cork, contradicting in some respects, and explaining in others, the contents of a letter which appeared in General Sunjury, which we have also from Cork in Saturday's and Monday's papers. We know nothing of the case beyond the threatening notice against Sir Charles Coote, and his exertions during many years to preserve tranquillity. It is stated that Sir Charles Coote and his family are about to leave the country.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION This body met as usual in Conciliation Hall, on Monday. Rent for the week, £20.

THE late famous Castle Bellingham Brewery (Ireland) took fire last week. Before the flames were extinguished the mill and a large quantity of malt were destroyed.

THE LATE MR. ROE.—The person named Lotergan, for evicting whom it is generally credited that Mr. Roe was assassinated, was arrested on suspicion of the murder of Mr. Roe, on the 16th inst. and who had escaped from Elphin Bridewell, has again been made amenable.

MR. PETER BORTHWICK, late Conservative M.P. for Evesham, has studied the sense of his speech-making tediousness from the floor of St. Stephen's to that of the Jamaica Chamber of Commerce; and, in a recent address to that body, he is reported as doing the locusts, in the following style:—"Before proceeding to Jamaica, in October last, Mr. Borthwick says he called on Lord Grey, at the Colonial Office, to intimate his intended journey, &c., and he proceeds thus:—'On saying England, that functionary (Lord Grey) advised him, if he was so fortunate as to find Jamaica planters agreeing, to shoot them by all means, and have them stuffed and carried home as curiosities.'"

EPITOME OF NEWS.—FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

The Duke and Duchess of Bedford are dispensing their princely hospitality at Woburn Abbey to a distinguished circle of guests, including his Serene Highness Prince Lowenstein, Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston, Lord and Lady John Russell, &c.

The Lord Chancellor (Lord Cottenham) is at present residing at Torquay, by the advice of his physicians.

Ibrahim Pacha returned to Lucca, from a short tour, on the 12th ult.

The King of the Netherlands, by a decree dated the 16th ult., has promoted to the rank of Rear-Admiral Prince Henry of the Netherlands, who has hitherto held only that of Captain.

The Earl of Louis Philippe, who has been lately affected with severe cold and hoarseness, is now quite restored.

A fancy ball is contemplated, under high and favourable auspices, to aid the Shakespere Fund, which is still minus.

NOW AND THEN. By SAMUEL WARREN, F.R.S. Blackwood.

(Second Notice.)

The reappearance of the author of "Ten Thousand a-Year," as a novelist, has naturally excited very considerable interest, and that extending to persons who are not generally readers of novels. Mr. Warren's contributions to this class of works are, indeed, peculiar; he does not present himself to the world as the advocate of certain startling notions of moral proprieties; nor does he affect to remodel society and its relations upon any Utopian scheme of his own brain. On the other hand, he seeks to work out the illustration of a principle by taking up some social error; and, in detailing its consequences, he shows how much pain and suffering may be spared mankind by the correction of the evil. The means by which this is sought to be effected, especially in the work before us, are of the simplest, yet most impressive, character. The story of "Now and Then" had, indeed, been already told in a few pages of Blackwood's Magazine; but this did not enable the author to carry out his high Christian purpose—to show how fallible is man in judging of the acts of his fellow men, as well as to estimate the good and wise end of Divine Providence in leading him through trials and afflictions which he too often regards but "through a glass, darkly."

The plot of "Now and Then" is extremely simple, and the leading characters few—not more than half a dozen. The period of the story is "somewhere about a hundred years ago," the scene in one of our sea-coast counties, in a parish called Milverstoke. The sketch of this village is, perhaps, the finest piece of descriptive writing in the work. Here, in a cottage quite of the old English kind, "dwells Adam Ayliffe, once a substantial, but now a reduced, yeoman." He is described as possessing open Saxon features: his countenance and figure were very striking; and an observant onlooker would have said of him, "that man is of a firm and upright character, and has seen trouble." When he spoke, it was with a certain quaintness in keeping with his simple and stern character; he was of a very independent spirit somewhat taciturn, and of a retiring, contemplative manner. His life was utterly blameless, regulated throughout by the purifying and elevating influences of Christianity. Ten years previously, he had lost his wife: "It had pleased God, who had given her to him, to take her away—suddenly, indeed, but very gently. He woke one morning, when she woke not, but lay sweetly sleeping the sleep of death." A year or two afterwards, he was suddenly reduced almost to penury, through the roguery of a collector of public rates, for whom he had become security. At this time, Ayliffe possessed some land adjoining his cottage, which he was compelled to sell, to make good the loss for which he had become liable. This stroke seemed to prostrate poor Ayliffe, for the property had been in his family for many generations. Another trouble was, that he could not, through his poor circumstances, for the marriage of his only child, Adam, who is, accordingly, jilted by the girl who was pledged to him. Yet young Adam was one of the finest young fellows in the county, of surpassing activity and strength, and with a reckless daring courage. Every one liked Adam Ayliffe: he had a laugh and a good word for all whom he met. He is a great favourite with the Vicar, the Rev. H. Hylton, who employs him in copying sermons at the Vicarage, and thereby young Adam falls in love with a certain maid of Mr. Hylton's Sarah—whom he marries.

Ayliffe's humble cottage lies almost under the shade of the magnificent castle of the Earl of Milverstoke, a nobleman of the old English baronial character. His Lordship's local agent is anxious to purchase the yeoman's remaining property to aid in forming a new approach to the Castle; the poor old yeoman, however, refuses, and this leads to a quarrel between the agent and the younger Ayliffe.

About a year after her marriage, poor Mrs. Ayliffe brings her husband a son. Trouble now thicken; young Ayliffe repines at his severe lot, and, during an evening walk, is prevailed on to accept a hare from a poacher in the village, as a delicacy for his sick wife: this treacherous kindness leads to young Ayliffe's conviction of being found with the hare in his possession; but the good Vicar pays the consequent fine, and the young man escapes imprisonment.

It is now Christmas; and there are grand doings at the Castle, to celebrate the return of the Earl of Milverstoke's heir, Viscount Aikmond, from the continent. This scene of gaiety, the contrast in our journal of last week, describes. During one of the fêtes at the Castle, Viscount Aikmond leaves the table, as proved subsequently, owing to some indirect reference to a duel, in which he had killed his antagonist, while abroad. The young nobleman, while walking in the Castle grounds, is murdered; a hot pursuit is raised, and the son, Ayliffe, under very suspicious circumstances, is arrested for the crime. He is tried, and sentenced to death; he protests fervently his innocence; but the evidence of circumstances being taken near the body of the murdered nobleman, with his clothes and a club stained with blood, are overpowering evidence of his guilt.

His aged father and the good Vicar are not, however, convinced. The poor old man can do but little to save his son; but, the clergyman, Hylton, employs the short time between the conviction and the day named for execution in unhunting to prove the innocence of the condemned. In vain, however, he supplicates the Earl of Milverstoke to recommend the prisoner to mercy, he is scorned for his sympathy, and desired to quit the Castle. But two or three days are left, in which to achieve the good work: the discovery of the murderers grounds for entreating the authorities to stay the execution: he journeys to London, places the evidence before the Secretary of State, and the Lord Chief Justice, who had tried the prisoner, is consulted. The statesman's interviews with these personages are among the best scenes in the book, they are the perfection of that circumstantial writing which lets not the interest of the reader's hope prey for a moment; and, as we have seen, the author makes that every stage of the solemn affair is narrated with all the exactness that might be expected from Mr. Warren's professional experience; indeed, it could only have been thus accurately detailed under such circumstances. Then follows the interview of the Secretary of State with the Sovereign; which we quoted last week. The result is that a messenger arrives but a few minutes before the hour fixed for the execution of the prisoner; and the sentence of death is commuted for that of transportation. Throughout these sufferings, the venerable Ayliffe is supported by his trust in Heaven: he prays with his misguided son, "the condemned cell," and supports him in the hope of mercy; in all this he is joined and sustained by the Vicar, until the good man's heart is riven with deep sympathy for the prisoner, whom he still believes to be innocent.

A length, the younger Ayliffe having taken leave of his son, and of the poor old man, and the Vicar, leaves the country, according to the commuted sentence. Meanwhile, the widow of Viscount Aikmond, Lady Anne Aikmond, the daughter of the Earl of Milverstoke, through the intercession of Mr. Hylton, become persuaded of the innocence of the banished man, and the Vicar undertakes the charge of the education of the young Viscount. His pupil proves to be the only child of the murdered Viscount Aikmond. Young Ayliffe, however, succeeds in the contest, and becomes Senior Wrangler. All this takes place during a lapse of twenty years from the date of the supposed murderer's sentence.

A few months before the contest at Cambridge, a poacher, who once lived on the Milverstoke estate, is executed for robbery; but, before he dies confesses that he killed Lord Aikmond, mistaking him in the dark wood for one of the Earl's keepers; and the finding of the murderous weapon, a plough coulter, in the place he described, confirms the confession.

The Vicar has, in the interim, wrought a great moral victory over the stubborn-hearted Earl, whom long-suffering and the unwearied efforts of the pious minister, have brought to penitence and humility; and the once proud Peer leaves his princely Castle to ask forgiveness of the patriarchal Ayliffe, in his lowly cottage, their reconciliation ensues. The banished Ayliffe is recalled, and returns to the home of his youth in time to witness his son's triumph at the University; the fortunes of the Ayliffes are improved by the richly-endowed living of the Earl; they recover their patrimonial property; and thus the story ends—in peace.

We have not left ourselves space to speak of the minor characters in the drama, which are so many portraits of village character in the days in which the ancient man passed in establishing the innocence of the younger Ayliffe, and restoring him to society; as well as in supporting the aged father through his tribulation. It is scarcely possible to point to a more beautiful picture of the true Christian minister, in the active exercise of those duties which endear him to us as the minister of God: his rule of life is not one of mere pulpit doctrine, but one that carries consolation to the bed of the sick, the cottage of the poor and oppressed peasant, and the cell of the condemned innocent: he alike heals the wounded spirit of the one, and comforts the broken heart of the other, passing through life unwearied in his true Samaritan spirit. The character of Ayliffe, too, shows how the poor and feeble old man, by aid of his never-failing companion—the Bible—bore up against a long life of affliction and sorrow yet comforted with the haven of a brighter and a better home.

The book, we need hardly add, is written with eloquence and pathos, in a pure and manly style; and it would be difficult to point to any work of its class which had so high an aim, or is so certain of producing beneficial results in every class of its readers.

STORIES FROM THE CHRONICLES. FROISSART. By the Rev. H. P. DUNSTER, M.A. Masters

THIS volume is the commencement of an attempt to introduce young readers to the sparkling pages of the Chroniclers, to which historians, poets, and novelists are indebted for almost all that has been written by them respecting the Middle Ages. The stories are to be told as nearly as may be in the language and style of the Chronicler, and arranged in the order of time in which the circumstances they relate took place. Thus, the history, manners, and customs of a parson in age or country will be illustrated in the narratives, rendered doubly attractive by the glittering picturesqueness of the Chronicler. The stories in the present volume are wholly from Froissart; they relate to the times of King Edward the Third, the best age of English chivalry; and, although many of the episodal narratives tell of the strange events of battle-fields, of siege and skirmish, and border warfare, they are not decidedly martial: the grandeur and splendours of chivalric life—its moral as well as the military qualities—its amusements mingled with the humanities of war. We commend this little book to the special attention of our readers; both for its excellent design and tasteful execution.

THE PICTORIAL BOOK OF BALLADS, TRADITIONAL AND ROMANTIC. Edited by J. S. MOORE, Esq. Second series. Washbourne.

This volume completes the work, the general character of which we noticed in its first Series. Among the pieces are the Irish Graveline Knight, the Dead Drummer, Fair Rosamond, the Eve of St. John, by Scott; St. Jerry, by Maginn; the Beauties Lady's Garland, the Wild Huntsman, by Bürger; May of the Morn Glen, by Hogg; the Outlaw Murray, from Scott's "Minstrelsy;" the Rime of the Ancient Mariner, by Coleridge; a Lyrell Geste, and others of the Robin Hode cycle; the Luck of Muncaster, from Roby's "Traditions of Lancaster;" Lady Bessy, (temp. Chas. II.); Patient Grisell; &c. In the Appendix are Cheny Chase, the Blind Beggar, Childe Maurice, the Battle of Otterbourne, the Ancient Wagoners (from Blackwood), &c. The volume closes with a Glossary, containing every word and expression at all uncommon occurring in either of the two Series. The introductory Notes are chiefly biographical, as heretofore: and the entire work must be regarded a very attractive contribution to our literature for the people. It is, certainly, calculated to keep alive national feeling and love of country, as well to feed and foster domestic affection, and reverence for hearth and home.

MONUMENTAL BRASSES AND SLABS. By the Rev. CHARLES BOUTELL, M.A. Bell

THE class of monumental memorials denom nated "Brasses" has, of late years, attracted the attention of archæologists in an inconsiderable degree: indeed, the preservation of these very interesting relics of Middle Age art has proved one of the most popular pursuits of archæology. What with "the ruthless spoliation of fanaticism in one age, and of combined ignorance and dishonesty in another" comparatively few of these monumental antiquities exist; and the Reverend author of the volume before us hints that the "Brass-rubbers" are almost as numerous as the Brasses themselves: let us hope that the paucity of the latter will lead to their being still more carefully protected; for, over and above their simple devotional character, which must ever endear them to Christian antiquaries, (as evidence of costume), and as a treasury of heraldic knowledge, as well as its casts and customs generally of former times, Monumental Brasses must ever possess a paramount degree of value and utility.

The work before us (produced by the tasteful hand of Mr. Parker, of Oxford,) furnishes abundant evidence of the interest attached to these Brass-rubbing expeditions; for it owes its origin to two papers read before the St. Alban's Architectural Society, at whose suggestion these articles have been so amended, extended, and illustrated, as to form a handsome literary volume of some 250 pages. The lectures themselves, too, originated in a choice collection of Brass rubbings being lent by some friends to the author. We agree with the author that common curiosity may have first induced the cramping away of dust, and spreading out of paper, and manipulation of heel-ball; but the research and the knowledge which it unveils—the glimpses which it gives us of the piety, affection, and loyalty of many a brave English feeling and sentiments far worthier than those of the most refined curiosity.

"It is because of their vivid representation of the long dead denizens of ages past,—because from generation to generation they bring before us, in all points as they were in life, the prince, the nobleman, the lady, the knight, the citizen, and the ecclesiastic,—the mail-clad warriors who first made Acre a name and a terror in the annals of British prowess, 'the victors of Cressy, and Poictiers, the Knights of Agincourt,' the chieftains of the rival roses, the Royal Edwards and Henrys, the chivalrous Robsarts, and Nevils, and Mortimers, the Howards and Stanleys, De Veres, De Greys, and Stanleys; and with these, a long array of worthies of every rank and calling, the honoured Delamere, who ruled so worthily over the one splendid, nay, the still splendid, establishment of the ancient Abby, (St. Alban's,) Greenfield and Waldeby of York, Esteney of Westminster, Goodrich of Ely, Bowforrest of Dorchester: the merchant, too, of by-gone centuries, in long flowing robe fenced with miniver, with his wife and grandchildren; and the civilian in his appropriate gown; and though last named, far from least in interest, esteem, and worthiness, the fair and virtuous of other days, the handmaids of many a forgotten paragon of Arcs, many a romantic tale, the Margarets, and Eleanors, and Philippas, whose regal eminence was enhanced by their lofty deeds,—it is because in the engraven memorials which mark the last resting-places of these and such as these, we possess the means of reproducing themselves in no unreal or fancied costumes, but according to their very images, as they lived and acted, because we are thus enabled to [illegible] personages, whose names make history famous, with form and fashion true to the very life, it is that the study of Monumental Brasses is almost invariably pursued at least with some enthusiasm."

We have quoted these eloquent passages from the introductory portion of the volume to show with how pure and holy an enthusiasm, the author treats the inquiry, and illustrates its claims upon popular encouragement. The details of the respective Brasses are assorted under Flemish, English, and Military; Brasses of Ladies, Ecclesiastics, Civilians, and Demi-Figures; Miscellaneous; Canopies, and Inscriptions; Palimpsest; Slabs despoiled of Brasses; Incised or Engraved Slabs; Rubbings of Brasses; Abbreviations, Contractions, &c. The whole is profusely illustrated with four-and-twenty lithographs, and nearly two hundred engravings on wood. The instructions for taking Rubbings of Brasses will be found very copious and minute in the latter portion. Indeed, the entire work bears the impress of rare research and exact appreciation of the artistical character of the memorials, as well of their sacred as their secular interest, and their value as genealogical and historical records and authorities.

THE JUVENILE VERSE AND PICTURE BOOK. With Numerous Illustrations on Wood. Burr.

A BEAUTIFUL reprint of minor poems of celebrity, with head and tail pieces, marginal woodcuts, and vignettes, after the manner of the "Poems and Pictures," issued by the publisher of the present volume. The scenic illustrations, too, are cleverly designed: for example, the death of King Henry the Third has four figures in as many pages. Corsica, and the Exile and the Outlaw, are treats in like artistic spirit. The poems are well chosen for the cherishing of kindly feelings among "juvenile" readers; and these early lessons of humanity have much to do with the after-character of the current of their life. Some of the pieces, too, are in a vein of humour which delights and teaches at the same instant.

LORD G. BENTINCK ON THE FINALITY OF THE REFORM BILL. Lord George Bentinck has made the following reply to a requisition made that he would allow his name to be placed on the list of Vice Presidents of one of the Committees established for the purpose of procuring the transfer of the right of representation from the boroughs to the western districts of the metropolis:—"Sir, I am very sorry I cannot concur in your views. I voted for 'the bill, the whole bill, and nothing but the bill.' As a final settlement, I agree with Lord John Russell, that the country cannot afford to undergo a revolution once in three years. I would say, once even in twenty years. I am, therefore, for leaving the Reform Act alone, looking upon it as a measure calculated to fulfil all the rational wants of the country for at least half a century from the date of its enactment. With these views, I cannot agree to have my name placed on the list of your Vice Presidents.—I have the honour to be, Sir, your humble servant, G. BENTINCK."

SCISSORS-METE.—To be sold, a Thrashing Machine, in good working order. Has a birch, cane, and strap barrels. Warranted to lick a school of fifty boys in twenty minutes, distinguishing their offences into literary, moral, and impertinent. Only parted with because the owner has flogged all his scholars away, and his sons are too big to beat. Apply at the College of Preceptors.—The Man in the Moon.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR THE NEW YEAR.

THE opening year in Paris promises to be very brilliant: splendid fêtes at the Tuileries and the English Embassy are anticipated; the Prince de Ligne and the Countess de L—— will shine in the gay galaxy of fashion; and the journals tell us significantly that the Duke de V—— has most sumptuously re-decorated his hôtel.

We hear, too, of many toilettes ravissantes. Among the new materials is mentioned the satin-Marguerite, worked with small flowers; and gauze embroidered with flowers in silks of the natural colours.

The corsages are very low, in the form of a V upon the breast; and the berthes are trimmed lightly in front, and long behind.

In town, grey cashmere is much worn, embroidered with grey velvet flowers, and trimmed with large buttons of passementerie, velvet, and soutache.

A robe of velvet cert d'Italy, with the corsage draped, and the sleeves trimmed with white lace, relieved by a large knot of rose-coloured ribbon, with long ends, and a papillon knot at the bottom of the corsage, is much admired.

Fur robes des chambres, flannel with cashemire patterns is a striking novelty for home wear. They are looped to the sides of the skirt with a cord and tassels; there is also a rich cordelière at the waist, but no other garniture.

The evening robes are trimmed with volants of black and white lace, placed alternately; these are generally upon rich shades of grenadie, gros vert, lotbelli, and gros bleu.

We abridge the following additional details from the "New Belle Assemblée:"

The forms and materials of out-door dress were last month in a great degree decided; the number of pardessus is, however, increased, by the introduction of the manteau, of a form between the mantelet and the mantle: they are made rather more than a half-length behind, long, and sloping almost to a point in front, and closed from the throat to the bottom by a row of buttons of a new form: they are wadded, lined with satin, and trimmed in general with fur. Indeed, notwithstanding the number of other trimmings, both of passementerie, black lace, velvet, and ribbon, furs predominate; and though the weather is still mild for the time of year, several fur mantelets have appeared.

Promenade Robes are of the same materials as last month, but black velvet and cloth retain a majority; deep blue, and vin de Bordeaux, are the colours respected for the latter. They are embroidered in soutache, interlighted with embroidery in [illegible] they are rarely worn with mantelets of the same, embroidered to [illegible] old. Velvet robes are decorated with passementerie of the same colour, with mantelets similarly trimmed, or, what is a better style, a fur mantelet, and the border of the robe trimmed with a band of fur to correspond.

Plain silks and plain poplins are also employed for robes de chambre, some are made with canges en rentre, the revers descending in robings down the front of the skirt; it is frequently bordered with several rows of narrow velvet ribbon put on flat, and quilted all round in very pretty patterns. Cashmere and Turkish silk ones are quilted all round in very pretty patterns. Cashmere and Turkish silk ones are the most decidedly elegant material for robes de chambre, but now it is always plain, either grey or fèvière, and trimmed with very rich ornaments in passementerie.

Coloured velvets, satins, velours épinglé, cashmere, and several of the new silks, are all in favour for half-dress robes. Several of those of cashmere are corated with applications guipurantes, of the same tone of colour which they are, and of above. These dresses are very much admired. Other style of trimming for the same robes, that is very much in request, is composed of [illegible] Never, indeed, were the garnitures of dress so numerous or so beautiful; velvet, plain, stamped, and of the last [illegible] very much in request: so is ribbon disposed in various ways and [illegible] Flounces are the prevalent garniture for dresses made in the robe form; they are either of black lace, fringe, or the material of the dress; when of the latter, they are lightly festooned round the edge, and either made with a braiding of the same, or one of ribbon à la vielle.

Caps are very much in favour in home demi-toilette, and particularly for social dinner parties, for which the robes are generally of the half-dress kind. Some of white blonde, of a round open form, are trimmed on each side with a bouquet of velvet flowers and foliage in full colours; others are composed of point d'Angleterre, trimmed with orange-satin ribbons, intermingled with black velvet. Those of pink blonde, decorated with cherry-coloured velvet, are a good deal seen. The last novelty is the petit bonnet à la Clarisse, made both in Brussels lace and point d'Angleterre; there are two or three falls gathered full, put carelessly on the head; they droop over the hair, and mingle with the flowers with which it is decorated.

Half-dress chapeaux are also in favour for these parties, and for the theatres. Some of the most elegant are of emerald-green velours épinglé; the interior is lined with white satin, drawn full in the capote style, each drawing formed by very narrow velvet: tufts composed of the same velvet, and blonde, adorn each side; the exterior is trimmed with a willow marabout, shaded in all the lighter tints of green.

The materials for Ball Robes are satin, taffeta, crape, crêpe lisse, lace; and for grand balls, gaze lamée, with gold or silver. Robes of light materials are made with two or three skirts, satin with one only, and taffeta with one or two. The corsages are deeply pointed, and cut very low, the skirts and sleeves shorter than those of evening dress. There is considerable variety in ball trimmings: several of the new ones are of passementerie, of excessive lightness; the effilés ondés, and the effilé crêpé are the most novel. Ribbon is also employed in a great variety of ways; one of the prettiest is a trimming à la vielle, or else in puffs, composed of gauze ribbon, either pink, blue, or very light green, lightly shot with gold or silver. Lace is very much employed for satin and taffeta robes; it is disposed in deep flounces; they are looped in the drapery style with flowers, or with ornaments of passementerie. Flowers are still in favour this year for ball robes.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JANUARY.

WESTMINSTER PLAY.

IN our Journal of Dec. 18th, we furnished our readers with a slight notice of the first representation, or rather the rehearsal of Terence's comedy of the "Adelphi," by the young gentlemen of Westminster School. On the 20th ult., we had the pleasure of witnessing the third representation, as well as on Thursday, when the performance was honoured by the presence of His Royal Highness Prince Albert.

These annual performances take place in the ancient and spacious dormitory of the School, a portion of which is partitioned off, and very tastefully decorated and arranged. In accordance with the Roman theatre, the musical department is conducted behind the scenes. On the spectator's right is a range of seats, appropriated to the old "Westminsters," or past "Captains" of the School. The next division is reserved for the ladies, of whom there is generally a small but brilliant assemblage (chiefly the friends of the head scholar, or Captain as he is termed). On the opposite side are ranged the masters and their friends. The small portion in the centre is occupied chiefly by visitors of distinction; and the gallery by the general company. The more juvenile scholars stand upon the topmost seat of the gallery; and their vociferous plaudits, when any trite aphorism of Terence occurs, furnish no small amusement to the audience, and at the same time demonstrate that they are better acquainted with the author, than their appearance would indicate.

The theatre on each occasion was crowded. Previous to the play, the Captain came forward in his collegiate dress, and delivered the Latin prologue, in which he more particularly alluded to the disappointment occasioned by the non-performance of the Terence play last year, owing, we believe, to some discussion as to the propriety of continuing these performances, which, we understand, is as old as the foundation of the school, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. The play throughout was admirably performed. The extraordinary fluency of the youthful actors, and their truthful delineations of the various characters, male and female, evinced not merely a true conception of the poet's creations, but a perfect mastery over the colloquial peculiarities which mark his style. Although, perhaps, the "Adelphi" falls somewhat short of the humour which characterises the "Eunuchus," it is on some accounts preferable to it as an acting play.

Our space will not allow of any elaborate analysis of the plot; suffice it, that two brothers, Demea and Micio, are represented by the poet as specimens of two very opposite dispositions. Demea lives a secluded country life, is very close and irritable. He is married, and has two sons, Æschinus and Ctesipho: the latter lives with him, and is kept very strictly; while the other son is adopted by his uncle Micio, and resides with him in the gay and bustling city. Micio's character presents a curious contrast; he is a bachelor, extremely mild and generous in his disposition, and is, moreover, lenient to a fault towards the follies and extravagances of his nephew. The opposite views of the bland Micio and the irascible Demea as to the care and education of youth, form some very amusing portions of the comedy, while the love affairs of the two youths furnish the main incidents of the plot. The slaves, or "Servi," of Terence, are generally characters of much study in these performances, and deservedly so, for on them depends much of the vis comica of the play. In the present instance, we thought the part of Syrus a very clever delineation of a rather difficult character. Perhaps the interview with Demea, in the first act, may be cited as the best illustration.

Of the acting of Mr. Clapcott, as Sostrata, the widowed mother, we cannot speak too highly. Her grief at the supposed desertion of her daughter by Æschinus, was very touchingly given. It drew forth, as it deserved, loud and prolonged applause. We were also much pleased with the acting of Geta—especially in the scene in the third act, where he vows vengeance against the whole house of Micio in general, and his servant Syrus, in particular—announcing his monstrous determination to annihilate the slave's father for producing such a wicked son—

'Seni animam primùm extinguerem ipsi qui
Illud produxit scelus:
Tum autem Syrum"—&c., &c.

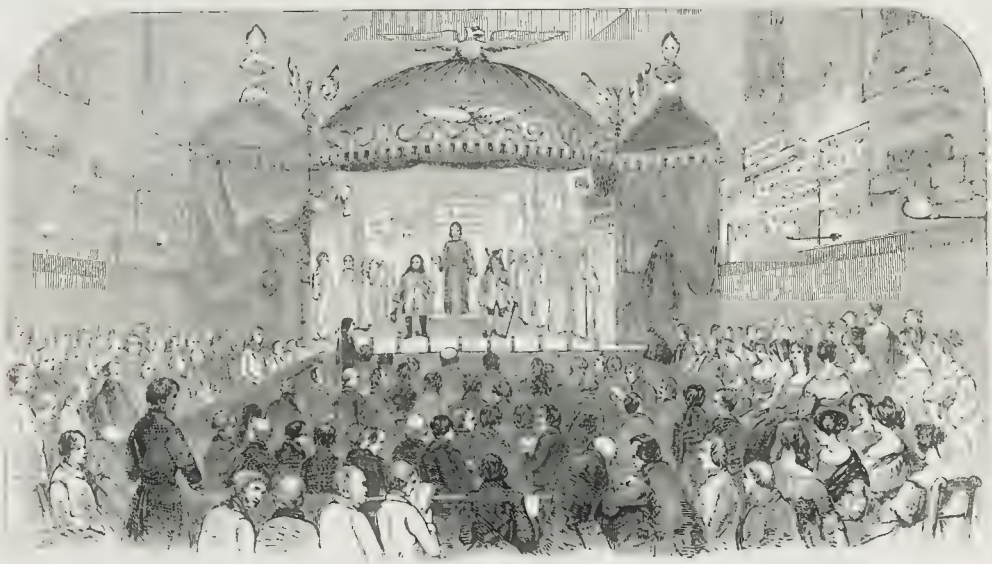
The parts of Demea, Æschinus, and Micio were all skilfully sustained. The dialogue between Demea and Micio, in the first act, in which the characters of the two old men are so well contrasted, was much applauded. Mr. Smart displayed a very perfect conception of the mild and good-natured Micio; and so truthfully did he delineate the character, that it was impossible to refrain from sympathising with the old man at his being suddenly thrust into a marriage with the old widow, Sostrata, in the fifth act, as if for no other purpose than to ridicule him—a proceeding in which we have often been puzzled to discover either the wit or the justice. We must not omit to add that the care and attention bestowed upon the costume of the actors in these plays, reflect great credit upon the classic taste and knowledge of those by whom such matters are arranged.

The play was, as usual, succeeded by an amusing epilogue. This portion of the entertainment, which may be viewed almost as a species of pantomime, is admirably adapted for drawing forth the comic powers of the performers. Some of the leading topics of the day are introduced; as, for instance, on the last occasion we remember, Mesmerism formed a prominent feature. In the present case, we had the imposing business of an election for M.P. Demea and Micio put up as candidates. Our country friend Demea starts on the agricultural interest, announcing his firm and unshaken principles as a "Protectionist:" while Micio proposes himself as a "Liberal," stating his determination to support "Free Trade." Our Artist has depicted this scene at the juncture when Hegio, habited as a counsellor, is upon the hustings, nominating the candidates, whose respective followers are represented, with their various banners.

We subjoin copies of some of the inscriptions and placards:—"Pax et Rurís Honos Demea Factor Agri." "Demea in Asternum." "Micio Pudore et Liberalitate." "Micio et Libera Commercia." Behind Hegio is a large placard "Senatorum Electorum: Dies Candidatorum Nominandorum XIII. Kal Jan. Hegio Notarius Publicus." Canthara and Sostrata are seen at the window holding the colours of their respective friends. It is scarcely necessary to say that the whole affair excited roars of laughter; the speeches of the rival candidates were of course received with that same tumultuous mixture of uproar and applause which always characterises such scenes; and it struck us at the moment that if the mob oratory at the hustings of Covent-garden were in Latin instead of English it would be quite as well heard and understood.

We annex a list of the performers on the occasion: Micio, N. R. Smart; Demea, H. Vaughan Williams; Sannio, J. R. Armistead; Æschinus, R. G. H Somerset; Syrus, H. R. Barker; Ctesipho, R. Burton; Sostrata, H. Clapcott; Canthara, W. D. Somerville; Geta, H. D. Nicholson; Hegio, F. H. Forshall; Dromo, T. B. Connell. Mutes—Tibicina, W. H. Horne; Parmeno, F. W. Stokes.

On Thursday evening, the 30th, his Royal Highness Prince Albert honoured the performance with his presence, when the theatre was very crowded.



WESTMINSTER PLAY.—THE ELECTION.

"A HAPPY NEW YEAR!" DRAWN BY KENNY MEADOWS

"A HAPPY NEW YEAR."

ILLUSTRATED BY KENNY MEADOWS.

SONG, BY MISS SHERIDAN CAREY.

(Author of "The Field of Waterloo." Vide The ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, June 21, 1845.)

A HAPPY NEW YEAR! to our Friends, far and near:
Old cares and old crosses forget them!
For the Bells pealing out, with a right merry shout,
Teach the welcome that Wisdom has set them.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR! and should peril draw near,
May it never reach those whom we treasure;
But guarded from ill, may they gracefully still
Reap the blessings of Earth without measure!

There are sighs, tho. are tears, for the sorrows of years,
There are troubles and sore tribulation;
MAY THE RULER above, in his mercy and love,
Lend an ear to the pray'rs of the Nation!

TO THE QUEEN OF OUR ISLES, to the HOME where She smiles,
Glad Wife and glad Mother, tho' Royal,
A HAPPY NEW YEAR! and rarices bless Her career,
To a People haught, loving, and loyal.

To the Rich, to the Great, e'er surrounded by state
(That all Men are Brothers, repeating),
To the Needy and Poor, who in patience endure,
Straight, a HAPPY NEW YEAR! we send greeting.

Yes, a HAPPY NEW YEAR! to all those who are dear:
May hope, love, and joy e'er possess them;
And the "Battle of Life" be to them void of strife:
Here's A HEALTH TO OUR FRIENDS AND GOD BLESS THEM!

COMPLIMENTS OF THE SEASON.

My neighbours, how happy may the new year be?
Are not all happy? What years take away
But fills the gap this side eternity.
Then mirth is wisdom, or the wise are they
Who shed on others joy a kindly ray.
Who are not Wassailers do them no wrong,
But unregaining, witnessing the gay,
Giving a whole heart's echo to their song,
They thank the Giver as who join the throng.

Laugh! young in hopes and years, laugh from the heart,
Clear in the beauty of its hope and aim,
And love (so pure that unswerving love will start).
Voltran or sage! live 'yond the world's acclaim,
Or censure, wearing shadows of a name.
Ye world-wise crowds! push on a happier year
Than that gone out with broken staff and lame;
Av'rice in front and Ruin in the rear,
They would have drag'd joy from her order'd sphere.

Yield us a happy year, ye rich and great!
Whose hopes too oft bring household peace despair:
Science! the new year gathers in your state,
Whirling new wonders in your thoroughfare;
May we find echoes of the old ways there!
Our wealth and wants spare, fiery Minister!
And oh! misrule be chased, disgraced, and bare
From law-vouch'd plea and frustrate massacre:
Erin's new year have many a follow.r.

It is the jubilee of days to-day,
The Sabbath of the year, the starting cheer
To our renew'd existence under way,
As We were fraught in charge to thee, new year!
Neighbours are brothers and their hearts are here,
In happy greetings on the hearth or street
Strange morrow! where Ill morrows disappear.
The old year—who the new hath chanced to meet,
Then off, with whate'er welcome, to the rear.—G. B.

THE WEATHER.

The sky during the past week has been nearly always covered by circrostratus and scud, the air has been at times in nearly a calm state; at no time has the wind been strongly, and it has passed over from the E. to the E. During the whole of the week there has been but little change of temperature either during the night or day, and it has been principally below the average for the season.

The following are some particulars of each day:

Friday, the sky was overcast throughout the day; a thin rain was falling occasionally; the direction of the wind was N. and E., but very light; and the average temperature for the day was 36°. Saturday, Christmas Day, was similar in almost all respects with the day preceding, and the day was very dull: its average temperature was 38°. Sunday, the sky was overcast throughout the day; the direction of the wind was N N E; and the average temperature for the day was 36°. Monday, the sky was overcast all day; the wind was N. and E., and the average temperature for the day was 35½°. Tuesday, the sky was covered by cloud all day, and the atmosphere was very damp; and on Sh. A. M. a little snow fell, being the first th t has fallen this winter; a lh. P. M., some hail fell; and at other times a thin misty rain was falling; the direction of the wind being at noon was N., and it was E. after noon. The average temperature of the day was 34½°. Wednesday, the sky was partially clear in the morning, and the first meteor on green road 19°, and that in air read 25½°; after Sh. A.M., the sky became again covered by cloud; there were light airs passing from the S.S.E.; and the average temperature for the day was 31½°.

The extreme thermometrical readings for each day were:—

RAILWAY INTELLIGENCE.

RAILWAY BILLS.—The first report of the Commissioners on Railway Bills which has been presented, consists of the following resolution:—"That the 145th standing order be suspended with regard to railway bills, and that all railway bills be referred to the Select Committee on Railway Bills before they are presented to the House." By a return of the Ways for which acts were passed last session, it appears that the number of miles authorised to be constructed was 1358; the amount of capital stock, £25,685,957; the amount of capital subscribed, £11,702,851; and the sum that was required to borrow, £13,764,871.

THE luggage unclaimed at the railway stations throughout the country, comprises every description of article, from a carriage down to a portmanteau, and from bank-notes to the value of many thousands a year. Complaints are made of the manner in which these are sold, being generally amongst the officials, without sufficient publicity given to the fact of the articles being unclaimed. A carriage was sold lately to an official for £14, though it had cost the owner £50 just before.

On the 11th, the locomotive of a train on the Cracow Railway got off the rails between that town and Myslowitz, and several waggons, laden with goods, down to the bottom of the embankment after it. The carriages containing the passengers were luckily not dragged off the line. The locomotive and the waggons were smashed, and, in their fall, killed the driver, the fireman, and three workmen.

INTERESTING DISCOVERY AT OXFORD.—Among the literary curiosities lately prepared for publication by the Camden Society, is the Day-book of John Dorne, a foreign bookseller, resident at Oxford, giving the prices, and often the printer, place, character, size, binding, and purchaser of the books which he sold, day by day, during the year 1520. This unique contribution to bibliographical history is preparing for the press by two distinguished scholars—Dr. Cotton, the Archdeacon of Cashel; and the Rev. John Wilson, Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford. The Society will produce it as soon as is consistent with the care and attention necessary to identify many of the "rare tomes" recorded by Master Dorne.

CALENDAR FOR THE WEEK.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JANUARY 1, 1848.

THAT every profession has a code of morality peculiar to itself, has been long recognised; it is more than recognised, it is allowed. A trader may "push" his goods by arts for which one not a trader would be severely censured; a soldier has a license for what in a civilian would be a crime. A class of opinions is created in every branch of life, recognised as valid rules of conduct by that section, which escape reproof oftener perhaps than they ought to do, for the sake of some practical utility arising out of them; for, as no one man is perfect, professions, which are but the skill of men put in action, must partake of the taint attaching to all human things. Nearly all the pursuits of the life of this world are, more or less, compromises with the code of abstract morality. They would become unendurable conruptions of it, did it make the world an abode fitter for demons than men, if an innate sense of right and wrong did not fix a boundary, beyond which no custom, however sanctioned, can pass—no "professional privilege" whatever can break through, without the sternest rebuke that can be administered. A trader may, by all lawful means, endeavour to get the largest profits on his wares; if he goes beyond the truth in the attempt, the judgment of the world is not too strict on the point. But dangerous deceit he must not practice; he must not vend poison in the name of food. The soldier may legally slay an enemy, but the military code prohibits murder and assassination. To all professions there are appointed limits of their powers to diverge from the natural laws of truth and peace, with one exception, and that, strangely enough, is the profession whose object is the preservation of order and morality, and whose duty is, in theory, to attain and secure justice. The profession of the law stands out with an unenviable distinction from all others, as possessing the most vitiated code of "class morality." The "privileges" of those who pursue it are so anomalous, so opposed to the ordinary rules that guide all other men, that it is difficult to understand how society permits the existence of such exceptions, save on the ground, that the bulk of mankind pass through life without needing the services of lawyers or courts; and that the minority who do come in contact with them cannot enlist the sympathies of the majority on their side. To give one instance; a barrister can keep the money of a client whose cause he has not only neglected, but positively damaged by that neglect. If we were compelled to resort to barristers as often as to physicians we, in this case last, the weak? The highest of the medical profession must give some attention, however slight, to a patient, or no fee is forthcoming. But there are other privileges still worse than this; the barrister's license to do anything in defence of his client, is often exercised with an unscrupulousness likely to make the law not only despised, but feared and hated. It is allowed to an advocate, perfectly cognizant of the guilt of his client, to fix the crime, if he can, on an innocent person. Countroisier's counsel, with the confession of that atrocious murderer in his pocket, proferred a defence of him that was perfectly "professional," yet it inspired among ordinary men one common feeling of disgust. A case has just occurred, where the defence was equally "professional," but only one degree less immoral. A criminal has been tried at York for a threefold murder; a man suspected of complicity was tried with him. Before the trial, the murderer had confessed his crime; all the facts were in the possession of those who managed the defence; yet every effort was made to throw the guilt on the suspected accomplice, whom the confession acquitted! All this is quite legal and proper, it appears, according to the "class morality" of the profession of the law, but it is a vile juggling with truth, that is criminal in itself, and might have fatal consequences. It is an attempt to attach guilt to (perhaps) an innocent man. The penalty of false guilt is death; what are those who knowingly seek to establish such criminality on such a person but murderers in intention? Out of a Court of Justice, a conspiracy to bring a false charge against an individual, is severely punished. What makes the distinction? Is there any limit to this privilege? and, if so, where is it? There must be one somewhere. Would privilege warrant an attorney or barrister in forging documents to procure a verdict? We presume not; is it a statutable offence. Could a counsel make use of papers which he knew or suspected to be forged, though he had no share in the transaction? We believe not. Would the privilege of the Bar warrant a counsel in picking a "learned brother's" pocket of a letter or a certificate, whose non-appearance might be essential? We believe not. What, then, is the degree of moral offence he may commit? We wish the "Bench and the Bar" would settle the question.

POSTSCRIPT.

METROPOLITAN COMMISSIONERS OF SEWERS A general meeting of the newly-appointed Commissioners of Sewers for the metropolitan districts, was held on Thursday, in one of the Committee rooms of the House of Commons. The chair was taken by Sir Edward Powell Buxton, M.P., and the other Commissioners present were the Dean of Westminster, Mr. Edwin Chadwick, Dr. Southwood Smith, the Hon. F. Byng, the Rev. William Stone, Mr. R. L. Jones, Mr. Leslie, Mr. Bullar, Mr. Hutton, Mr. Brodeiip, and Mr. Peacock. The principal business before the Commissioners was the reception of the accounts of the defunct Commissioners for the several districts, the payment of certain bills, and the transfer of the balances on hand from the bankers of the districts into a fund to be kept at the Union Bank of London.

DISTRESSED NEEDLEWOMEN'S SOCIETY.—The Barristers' Annual Ball in behalf of the funds of this charity was held on Thursday night, at the Hanover-square Rooms. About 200 persons were present.

THE VERNON GALLERY. The trustees of the National Gallery have made their selection from the gallery of Mr. Robert Vernon, and have accepted for the nation 160 pictures. The deed conferring this magnificent gift upon the British people has been executed; and it now only remains for the nation to erect a structure fitted to receive the collection. Until this is done, we believe, the pictures will not be removed from the house of the donor, in Pall-mall. Among the 160 pictures, are four of the finest works of Turner; of examples of Etty there are six; of Eastlake, two; of Maclise, two; of Mulready, three; of Uwins, two; of Landseer, six; of Briggs, two; of Stanfield, four; of Collins, three; of Chalon, one; of Leslie, three; of Webster, two; of Callcott, seven; of Wilkie, three; of Jones, two; of Lance, three; of E. M. Ward, three; of Sydney Cooper, two; of F. Goodall, two; of Sir Joshua, one; of Gainsborough, two.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

ITALY.

The most recent advices from Rome state that the Liberal and Retrograde parties were respectively making desperate efforts to secure the support of the Pope, and that Lord Minto had taken a decided part in favour of the former, and nearly succeeded in persuading his Holiness that the war in Switzerland had been directed, not against the Catholic religion, but against the Jesuits. The celebrated preacher, Father Ventura himself, had an interview with the Pope on the 15th ult., when he did not hesitate to condemn the marked predilection of his Holiness had lately evinced towards that religious order; and observed that, if he wished to serve the Jesuits, he should do so ostensibly, because his alliance with them would destroy his cause, with that of Catholicism, by giving to it the unpopularity attached to that order. The Pope, who is under the influence of his new confessor, cut the conversation short by requesting Father Ventura to drop the subject. Lord Minto was still at Rome, warmly embracing the party prevailed on the holy Pontiff to revoke the bull against the Irish Colleges not from any objection on the part of his Holiness, but from the unconquerable opposition of the sacred conclave. The attempt of his Lordship to establish diplomatic relations between England and Rome appears to have been equally unsuccessful. The Pontifical Government was well disposed to agree to the proposition, but, on condition that a nuncio should be accredited in London. To this Lord Minto objected, in the name of his Government, which would only consent to receive a lay representative.

Monsignor Corboli Bussi was to be elevated to the dignity of Cardinal, and would, in all probability, succeed Cardinal Ferretti in the post of Secretary of State.

Our private letters from Naples, of the 18th ult., announce the arrest of Don Camillo Caracciolo and the Duke d'Albanetto, for having joined in the popular demonstration of the 15th.

Letters from Genoa, of the 23rd ult., announce an insurrectionary movement in Sicily. It is stated that 7,000 armed peasants had descended from the mountains, and entered Palermo, and that the garrison had, in consequence, retreated from the city into the citadel.

A bold attempt has been made to obtain some reform of the abuses of Austrian misrule in Lombardy, by a deputy who seems not to have the fear of M. Metternich before his eyes. According to letters from Milan of the 10th inst., M. Nazari, the deputy of the City of Bergamo, in the central congregation of the kingdom, had moved a resolution, founded on the universal discontent of the country, that a committee be appointed to lay before the Emperor of Austria a project of reform for the Lombardo-Venetian Kingdom. Although this motion was opposed by the Governor of Milan, who is President of the Congregation, and who dec ared that the Viceroy himself was engaged in preparing a project of reform, it was passed unanimously by the assembly, twenty-four members of which were present. The President found himself compelled to proceed to the nomination of the committee, declaring, nevertheless, in the name of the Viceroy, that no discontent prevailed in the country. The committee consisted of the following deputies. Count Porro, for Como; Dr. Villa, for Milan; Count Schlirzi, for Cremona; Count Barni, for Lodi; M. San Gervasso, for Brescia; M. Nazari, for Bergamo; and M. Zanetti, for Mantua.

When this proceeding became known, the greatest excitement prevailed in Milan, and the inhabitants crowded to the residence of M. Nazari, to inscribe their names, as an expression of respect and approbation.

FRANCE.

The Deputies met on Wednesday to organise their Standing Committees and verify the powers of the Members elected during the recess. They subsequently assembled in their hall to appoint the President, Vice-Presidents, and Secretaries during the session. The ballot for the Presidency presented the following result :—M. Sauzet, 227; M. Odilon Barrot, 105; Dupin, 13; Dufaure, 9

M. Sauzet, having obtained the majority, was proclaimed President of the Chamber.

AMERICA.

The British and North American Royal mail steam-ship, Britannia, Captain HARRISON, arrived at Liverpool on Thursday night. She sailed from Boston on the 16th, and Halifax on the 19th; has forty-three passengers, and the usual semi-monthly mails from Canada and the United States, besides specie to the amount of £93 000. The Britannia brings seven days later intelligence from the United States, as well as late accounts from British America; but they are not of an important character.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

COMMANDERS OF LINE-OF-BATTLE SHIPS. The Admiralty have removed the restrictions which prevented commanders from being eligible to serve as second captains of line-of-battle ships, unless they had served some time in the rank of lieutenant of a sloop or frigate. Their Lordships have now ordered that commanders who have served as first lieutenants of any vessel for one year, and commanders who have served as second lieutenants for that space of time in any ship, shall be deemed eligible for the appointments to commanders of ships of the line.

The Woolwich division of Royal Marines has at length obtained barrack accommodation on shore. On Saturday last the officers and men quitted the old Benbow, where they have been so uncomfortably hulked for so many months, and marched into their new and very expensive barracks, which ought to have been prepared for the division at least half-a-dozen years since.

THE SEWERS COMMISSIONERS.—Two of the Chairmen of the old Sewers Commissioners for the metropolis (one of whom is now a Metropolitan Commissioner) refused to hand over their accounts and their cash in hand to the new Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers, whose appointment has superseded all the others.

FATAL ACCIDENT TO CAPTAIN HAMSLY, R.N.—On the 19th ult., while at Ellerdiver, Roborough Down, Captain Peter Sampson Hamsly, formerly of Longbrook House, Plympton, and his lady, were returning home in a phaeton drawn by one horse, from Buckland Church, the horse, as soon as it had passed the gate, set off at full speed down the hill leading to the house, and the deceased lost all command of it. An empty cart happened to be standing in the avenue, against which the phaeton struck, and immediately capsized, throwing Mr and Mrs. Hamsly out on the path. The former was killed on the spot, while Mrs. Hamsly escaped with only a few bruises. The deceased was a stout, heavy man, of about 63 years of age.

EXTENSIVE ROBBERY BY A POT-BOY. On Tuesday afternoon information was forwarded to the police that the pot-boy, in the employ of Mrs. Wieland, widow of the late celebrated Wieland, the actor, of the White Hart Tavern, Oxford-market, had absconded, taking with him a tin cash-box, containing upwards of £70 in gold and silver. The police have got a clue which no doubt will tend to the villain's apprehension.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

DR. HAMPDEN'S APPOINTMENT TO THE SEE OF HEREFORD.

Dr Merewether, the Dean of Hereford, has again addressed Lord John Russell on the subject of the Bishopric of Hereford, on the see of Hereford, in a letter in which, having stated the various obligations which he undertook on becoming a member of the University of Oxford, on being admitted to sacred orders, and on his installation to his present office, he declares he has a second time examined Dr. Hampden's writings with the view of testing the orthodoxy of that divine's religious opinions, and he then says:—"It is painful in the extreme to feel obliged to declare that I discover in these writings many assertions—not merely references to theories or impressions of others—but assertions, which to my calm and deliberate appreciation appear to be hazardous, I believe I may say heretical, and very much which is most dangerous, most objectionable, calculated to weaken the hold which the religion we possess as yet obtains, and ought to obtain always, upon the minds of its professors."

He then points out the still-standing decrees of censure pronounced by the University against Dr. Hampden, and concludes thus :

"The time draws near—on Tuesday next the conference of an election is to be exhibited. I ventured to assure your Lordship that I could not undertake to say that it would be an unanimous election; I was bold enough to affirm that it would not be unanimous, and I, in my turn, received the intimation to use the caution. I will not say the threat—that the law must be vindicated. Already have I assured your Lordship that the principle on which this painful affair is regarded, is that of the most solemn religious responsibility; I consider in regard it in this light. I have already told you, my Lord, that the watchword of such is this "Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye." I have anxiously implored your Lordship to pause—to avert the blow, I have long since told you the truth. I have endeavoured to prevent, by every means in my power, the commotion which has arisen, and the necessity of the performance of a painful duty. I hoped the congé d'elire would not be issued until a fair inquiry and investigation had been instituted. A suit has been commenced in the ecclesiastical courts—why not have awaited its issue? When the congé d'elire did appear, I, as one presumed, humbly, but faithfully, though I stood alone, to petition the Crown; and now, when I am officially informed that her Majesty has not been pleased to name any considerations thereunto,' I feel it to be my bounden duty, after a full and calm deliberation on the whole subject, having counted the cost, but remembering the words of Him whose most unworthy servant I am—'He that loveth house or lands more than me is not worthy of me' loving my children dearly, and ardently desiring to complete the noble work which I have for seven years laboured to promote, yet not forgetting that there is an hour of death and a day of judgment, I must, I will, I do, protest, on the merits of my Redeemer, to be allowed to look up with hope, that I may be considered by the intercessions of mercy and pity to have been faithful in the hour of trial, to have fought a good fight, to have kept the faith, to have finished my course'—believing that I risk much, and shall incur your Lordship's heavy displeasure, who may, if you will, direct the sword of power against me and make me feel even that I preclude myself from all hope, from all charities have been my lot, and expecting that I shall bring down upon myself the abuse and blame of some—I say, my Lord, having fully counted the cost, having weighed the sense of bounden duty in the one scale against the consequences in the other, I have come to the deliberate resolve, that on Tuesday next no earthly consideration shall induce me to give my vote in the Chapter of Hereford Cathedral for Dr. Hampden's elevation to the see of Hereford.

"I have the honour to be, my Lord, your Lordship's faithful humble servant,
"Hereford, Dec. 29. JOHN MEREWETHER, Dean of Hereford."

The following is Lord John Russell's reply :—

"Woburn Abbey, Dec. 25, 1847

"Sir,—I have had the honour to receive your letter of the 22d instant, in which you intimate to me your intention of violating the law.

"I have the honour to be your obedient servant,
"J. RUSSELL.

"The Very Rev. the Dean of Hereford."

ELECTION OF DR. HAMPDEN.

On Tuesday last this agitated question was finally settled—officially at least—at the Cathedral in Hereford.

The Very Rev. John Merewether, D.D., Dean of Hereford, entered the Cathedral shortly after eleven, and proceeded to the Lady Chapel, accompanied by the canons residentiary, the prebendaries, and some officials of the Cathedral.

There were present—the Rev. H. H. Morgan, the Rev. Dr. Huntingford, Lord Saye and Sele, the Rev. W. F. Musgrave, canons residentiary; the Rev Thos. Huntingford, precentor; the Rev. E. Howell, succentor; the Rev. J. Garbett, treasurer; the Venerable Archdeacon Wetherall; the Venerable Archdeacon Vicars, and the several prebendaries.

Church service having been read, and the customary formalities complied with,

The Dean said it now became their duty to proceed to the election of a bishop and chief pastor of that diocese, on the appointment of their late bishop, the Right Rev. Dr. Musgrave, to the Archbishopric of York. Her Majesty had been pleased to grant to the Dean and Chapter of Hereford, congé d'elire, empowering them to elect another bishop, and in a letter missive, which generally accompanied the Sovereign's permission to elect, her Majesty had been pleased to recommend to the Dean and Chapter that they should elect as their future bishop the Rev. Renn Dickson Hampden, D.D., Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Oxford. That document had been read, and it now became the duty of the Chapter to determine upon the matter. It was usual on these occasions that the vote of the junior prebendary should be first taken, and that the last vote tendered should be that of the Dean.

The names of the canons were then called, and their assent or dissent from the appointment of Dr. Hampden was taken. Two or three of the junior canons voted successively for Dr. Hampden. On the name of Canon Huntingford being called, that gentleman immediately rose and stated his reasons for the course he felt obliged to adopt on the occasion, viz, to wait for an impartial and solemn decision on the subject from a tribunal competent to pronounce it.

One or two other persons having tendered their assents, it became the duty of the Dean (Dr. Merewether) to record his vote.

The Dean of Hereford rose and reiterated the reasons he has already published for not concurring in the election of Dr. Hampden, and thus concluded: "And here, in the sight of God, in the midst of this assembly, I declare that, solemn as the priestly office, I solemnly protest that it is no deficiency, in the smallest degree, of loyalty and humble devotion to our Sovereign—it is the distate of my conscience, the convictcon of my mind, which constrains me so to act in averting the progress of infidelity, mockery of religion, and profaneness. Upon these grounds I cannot vote for the election of Dr. Hampden as Bishop of the vacant see of Hereford, and pastor of the Cathedral Church of which I am Dean; and I do merely protest against this proceeding to-day, inasmuch as many persons have voted who are only honorary prebendaries, and have not complied with the statutes of this Church, which I have declared I will observe, and I protest against the majority which will be claimed, inasmuch as its necessary for giving valid ity to a vote that the majority should include the Dean and three canons residentiary. This protest I shall forward to the Crown, the Bishop elect (Dr. Hampden), and the Archbishop of Canterbury

Some discussion having followed on the subject of the votes protested against by Dr. Merewether,

The Dean said I will now proceed to state to you the number of votes polled three canons residentiary have voted for Dr. Hampden, five prebendaries of the old order have voted for Dr. Hampden, a succession of that body being absent; six junior prebendaries have voted for Dr. Hampden, three of that body being absent. The Dean and one canon residentiary had voted against Dr. Hampden. The case then stood thus :

For Dr. Hampden	{	3 Canons Residentiary 5 Prebendaries of the old order. 6 Junior Prebendaries.
Against Dr. Hampden ..	{	1 Dean 1 Canon Residentiary.

The Canons Residentiary who voted in favour of Dr. Hampden were—Lord Saye and Sele, the Rev. H. H. Morgan, and Archdeacon Musgrave; the Canon Residentiary who voted against Dr. Hampden was Dr. Francis Hurt Dyke.

Canon Morgan moved that the election of Dr. Hampden should be declared according to the usual formalities.

Lord Saye and Sele seconded the motion.

The Dean remarked that, having stated that there were for Dr. Hampden fourteen votes, against him two, it remained for the Chapter to say whether that was an election of Dr. Hampden or not. The statute required that there should be an unanimous assent and consent.

After some discussion on this point, the motion proposed by Canon Morgan, and seconded by Lord Saye and Sele, was agreed to.

The Dean: We have now to decree three certificates; one to the Crown, one to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and one to the Bishop-elect.

Mr. R. Underwood, Mr. J. Murder, and Mr. Francis Hurt Dyke, were then appointed Notaries; after which, the secular business of the day was brought to a close, and the Dean and Chapter returned to the choir, and proceeded with the usual services of the Church.

On the result being made known, the bells of All Saints Church rang merrily

ADDRESS TO DR. HAMPDEN.—In an address, signed by between 600 and 700 of the clergy and laity, which was on Monday presented to the Rev. Dr. Hampden, at Christchurch, Oxford, by a deputation of clergymen from London, accompanied by the Rev. Dr. Jeune, Master of Pembroke College, Oxford, the following passage occurs:—"The public announcement of your religious views, which you made when entering upon your office, and the sermons which you have preached before the University as Regius Professor, and subsequently published, as well as your other official acts, have, in our judgment, fully evidenced the soundness of your theological opinions, and your high claims to the professorial chair." Dr. Hampden's reply expresses his great gratification at receiving such an address at the present critical juncture.

The Morning Chronicle, on the subject of the Dean of Hereford's protest against the election of Dr. Hampden, says:—"We are enabled to state distinctly that the Dean of Hereford memorialized the Queen to give Ans the vacant bishopric—that the Queen referred his suit to the Prime Minister—and that the Prime Minister's rejection of the decanal solicitation was what first provoked the late obstreperous expression of self-sacrificing heroism. It is no mere conjecture, but, an actual fact, that Dean Merewether was a disappointed suitor for promotion before he came out in the character of saint and martyr."

The Archbishop of York is to be enthroned on the 18th inst., at the Cathedral Church at York. His Grace has appointed the following Sunday for an ordination at the Minster, and not at the Archiepiscopal Palace at Bishopsthorpe, where they were usually held by the late Archbishop.

INSTALLATION OF THE DEAN OF RIPON.—The Hon. and Rev. H. D. Erskine, who was some time since promoted to the Deanery of Ripon, rendered vacant by the death of the Very Rev. Dr. Webber, was formally installed on last Friday afternoon, in the presence of the Archdeacon of Ripon, Canon Anley, Canon Sutton, Canon Grey, and a large number of the prebendaries and the parochial clergy. Full choral service was performed, and in the afternoon a sermon was preached by the new Dean, who selected for his text the 3rd chapter of the Book of the Prophet Malachi, verse 6.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON'S PASTORAL LETTER.—The Bishop of London has addressed a letter to his clergy, inculcating the line of conduct to be pursued by them in consequence of the probable visitation of the cholera. The Bishop dwells upon the certainty that the intemperate and the filthy, and especially the many who were both drunken and dirty, were the chief victims of the cholera, on its former visitation of this country. He says to the metropolitan clergy :—"Call the attention of the proper officers to such cases as may appear to require their interference; and rem nd those members of your flock, whom Providence has intrusted with the means of alleviating the misery of their fellow-creatures, that a portion of their charitable expenditure can hardly be more safely or more usefully directed than towards defraying the expense of cleansing and ventilating the miserable abodes of those by whose labour they are directly or incidentally benefited; and you may add, that a very moderate outlay, judiciously made, will accomplish a great deal in the way of such improvements.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

A FRENCH club has just been established in London, for the use of the French nobility, gentry, and professional men. Its rules are similar to those of the English clubs, including the ballot for the admission of members. The inauguration banquet took place on Thursday (last week), at Dubourg's Hotel, the late quis Bouffet de Montauban presiding. It is to be called the "Cercle Français."

COMMERCIAL TRAVELLERS' SCHOOLS.—On Monday, the establishment of these Schools, (engraved in our No for Dec. 18), was commemorated by a Public Dinner at the London Tavern; the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor in the chair, supported by the Sheriffs, Mr. Masterman, M.P.; Mr Waddington, M.P.; Mr Moffatt, M.P.; and a numerous attendance of mercantile gentlemen. The company numbered upwards of 400 guests, of whom sixty were accommodated in an apartment adjoining the large dining-room of the Tavern. After dinner and the customary loyal toasts, the Lord Mayor, having himself a very efficient chairman), proposed "Prosperity to the Commercial Travellers' Schools." his Lordship explaining the origin of their establishment, and the extensive aim and object, as successfully as to cause subscriptions to pour in liberally, the amount collected, during the evening, exceeding £2000. The healths of the President, Mr. Masterman, M.P.; the Treasurer, Mr. George Moore; and the other officers of the Charity, were drunk with great enthusiasm, as was also the health of the able Chairman, the Lord Mayor The musical arrangements were under the superintendence of Mr. N. J. Sporle, assisted by Mr. Edney, Mr. Kenny, Mr. Genge, Mr. Kench, &c. During the evening, Mr. Sporle sang an appropriate piece composed by him for the occasion, which was much applauded. The children of the Schools also sang a hymn from the gallery with good effect.

NEW SURGICAL OPERATION.—An operation in surgery, of a very formidable and intricate nature, was performed on Monday last, by Mr. Thomas Wakley, at the Royal Free Hospital The chloroform was used on the occasion with complete success. There were between thirty and forty practitioners present, who appeared to view the operation with great interest, as it was the first time that it had ever been performed. The operation consisted in dissecting out the two chief bones of the foot, and in cutting off the ends of the bones of the leg which form the inner and outer ankles. The bones were dissected out in less than six minutes, and the remaining portion of the foot having been adjusted in its new position by a bandage, the patient was removed to his bed, where he expressed his gratitude to the operator, and declared that he had not felt the slightest pain.

MORTALITY IN THE METROPOLIS.—The Registrar-General's return for the week ending Saturday last contains the satisfactory information that the reign of epidemic catarrh is abated, and the metropolis restored to nearly an average amount of health. The deaths registered in last week were only 1,147 a number 300 beyond the average when compared with the mortality of almost double the amount, which has recently attracted universal observation. The following tables exhibit the whole course of the epidemic, both in the several districts of the metropolis, and according to the various forms of disease which principally contributed to the loss of life :—

ACCOUCHEMENT OF MARY ANN HUNT. This wretched female, who was tried and convicted for the wilful murder of an aged woman, of the name of Stowell, and whose case, from the peculiarity of the circumstances connected with it, created at the time a good deal of attention, gave birth to a male infant at four o'clock on Tuesday morning last, in Newgate Prison. The wretched woman will, as soon as she has properly recovered from her confinement, be removed to Millbank prison, preparatory to her sentence of transportation being carried into effect.

THE OLD YEAR AND THE NEW.

ILLUSTRATED BY WILLIAM HARVEY.

Upon the next page our Artist has pictured two of the commemorative scenes by which the passing from one year to another is customarily distinguished. Of these, by the way, Coleridge does not approve, and he has a line of poetic rebuke—

"Why dance ye mortals o'er the grave of time?"

We append a seasonable tribute by a Correspondent :—

HARK! those bells so merry pealing!
'Tis the OLD YEAR'S parting knell;
Time is onward quickly stealing,
Let us haste to say farewell!
Farewell! OLD YEAR! a kind farewell!
Though I shan't parting from me fast;
Yet many a tale of thee we'll tell,
When recounting o'er the past!
Good-by! good-by! OLD YEAR a good-by!
Here thou canst no longer stay:
Thy number'd moments swiftly fly,
Then away! away! away!

CHORUS

Hark! those bells so merry pealing, &c.

Hark! those bells so merry pealing!
'Tis the NEW YEAR'S promis'd time;
Let us then, with thankful feeling,
Join to sing its natal chime!
A welcome to thee, young NEW YEAR!
Joy and peace attend thy reign;
So may thy course be bright and clear,
Free from want and free from pain:
We hail thy coming, Child of "Time!"
And again our welcome sing!
The merry bells another chime,
Shall for thee a greeting ring!

CHORUS.

Hark! those bells so merry pealing, &c.

But! those bells so merry pealing!
Speak a message to each heart:
Time on us is silent stealing,
And we soon from all must part.
Yes! we, and all created things
Soon must fall and fade away!
For OLD TIME in changes brings,
Certain death and sure decay
Then let us keep this truth in view,
And so regulate our life,
That we may run our course quite through,
Free from wrong and free from strife.

CHORUS.

Hark! those bells so merry pealing;
'Tis the NEW YEAR'S natal time!
Let us then with joyous feeling,
Celebrate the happy time.

THE NEW YEAR.

The old man he is dead, young heir,
And gone to his long account;
Come, stand on his hearth, and sit in his chair,
And ride his saddle mount!

The old man's face was a face to be fear'd,
But thine both loving and gay;
Oh, who would not choose for that stern white beard
A bright young cheek alway?

The old man he had outlived them all,
His friends were dead and gone;
But hundreds are wassailing now in the hall,
And true friends every one!

The old man moaned both sore and long
Of pleasures past, he said;
But pleasures to come are the young heir's song,
The living, not the dead!

The old man trembled at sight of death,
His life was drear and lone;
But the young heir has not a feather of debts,
His heart's all his own!

The old man used to shudder, and seem
Remembering secret sin;
But the happy young heir is as if in a dream,
Paradise all within!

Alas! for the old man—heaven have mercy!
And fear for thyself, young heir;
For he was innocent once as thou,
As ruddy and blythe and fair

Reap wisdom from his furrowed face,
Cull counsel from his fear;
Oh, speed thee, young heir, in gifts and in grace,
And blessings on thee NEW YEAR!

THE THEATRES.

CHRISTMAS has always been a time of great activity in the theatrical world; but perhaps there has not for a very long time been so much bustle at the various places of entertainment as at the present season. Collect all the opinions of the holiday-keepers, we believe we may say that the piece which will live the longest, and please the most, is the LYCEUM burlesque—that the PRINCESS' pantomime is, generally, the best; and that the SURREY stands forward pre-eminent in the fun of its opening. We will now proceed to report upon them individually.

DRURY LANE.

After Balfe's new opera, the pantomime called "Friar Rush, or Harlequin and the Gold," was produced, to a house crammed to the ceiling. The story is thus:—The Baron Catcovellenbogenvassenheim (Mr. Heslop) falls in love with the beautiful Hilda (Miss Waite), the daughter of an old woodcutter (Mr. Chapius). She is beloved by Frizt (Mr. Harvey), and the good fairies of course take up the cause of the young people. The Baron, being in distressed circumstances, applies to King Gold (Mr. Morrison) for his assistance. He gives it, and wealth is about to triumph, when Friar Rush (Mr. J. W. Collyer), instigated by the fairies, summons an army of ignes fatui about him, and, by deluding appritions, leads the Baron and the Headsman (Mr. Naylor) through swamps alive with frogs and snipes, and other horrors of gigantic size, until they sink exhausted into the morass. Meantime King Gold has caught the lovers, and is about to hand them over to the mercies of the Baron, who falls right through the earth to the good fairies of coarse caverns; when the good Fairy (Miss Rance) appears, and changes Fritz and Hilda to Harlequin and Columbine; and the Baron and his Headsman become Pantaloon (Mr Garden), and Clown (Mr. T. Ridgeway). The comic business then commences, with a country public-house, in which the indestructibility of Harlequin is famously shown. He is crammed down a pump, pumped out into a pail, rolled flat, fired out of a cannon, decapitated, has his head thrown into the pit, and otherwise marvellously ill-treated, but always comes up entire again. It is a physical scene, of the old school, depending entirely upon the exertion of the pantomimists. Next, we have a living view of Boulogne, on the quay, with the hotel "tooters," poissarder, douaniers, and visitors, all busily and activite. The Clown here makes great business of examining the travellers: Punch is well received, but upon the discovery that it is a caricature of Louis Philippe in his portfolio; and, finally, a luckless traveller is passed through the douane people, who examine him at every place. Legal Hall next appears, and we have a very comical police, after this, a bedroom scene is introduced for the Clown and Pantaloon, whose beds turn into two fishing boats, and the room into the open sea. Next, the scene of the Nine Elms Pickle Warehouse, with all the immediate adjuncts of that locality, and, as it is managed by the clowns and the Covent Garden performance, the entire scene changes to an allegorical representation of Shakspeare's deathless fame. A Mnemonyke and Pianoforte publisher's afford room for some of the Clown's oyster-eating and pilfering, and soon after the Tennis Court. After this, the ascent of the Victoria Balloon, and a fall in the sea, and the shock of the stars, and the curtain then upon a tableau presenting ground flora.

We do not, then, remember to have escaped from a pantomime. It was entirely composed of scenes, each of which was made the most of. The fairies, and the clowns were admirably managed, and the harlequinade was as good as any we have seen for many years. Indeed, we think that, altogether, the pantomime is worthy of the name. It is not a string of scenes, but a connected piece, and we have only to add, that the scenery, dresses, and decorations are all of the most splendid description, and that the whole is got up in a manner worthy of the house.

The only drawback to the success of the piece was the length of the performances. It was not finished until half-past twelve o'clock, and the consequence was, that the greater part of the audience left before the conclusion. This was a pity, as the pantomime deserves to be seen to the end. We understand that Mr. Balfe's opera became ready too late to be produced at Christmas, and that it will be produced on the occasion of the Queen's visit. This is a pity, as it will be a great disappointment to many, but it could not be helped.

The performances of Mr. Balfe's opera and pantomime will be the only novelties at this theatre during the holidays, Mr. Jones having determined to produce Mr. Balfe's opera because Christmas was the time to bring it out, and he could not help it. The scenery and dresses will be entirely new, and the whole will be got up in a manner worthy of the house and of the composer. It was a pity that the opera could not be produced at Christmas, as the pantomime rehearsals, thus delaying it, have been a great inconvenience to the performers, and have prevented them from having any holidays. The pantomime will be produced on Monday next, and the opera will be brought out as soon as possible after the pantomime has been got well under way.

HAYMARKET.

Mr. A. Becket has once more come forward as a burlesque writer, and, in conjunction with Mr. Lemon, written a piece called "The World Underground; or, the Golden Flute and the Brazen Waiters," which did not create any great sensation on the first night, but which we hear has since gone much better. Prince Emerald (Miss P. Horton) has dreamt of some young lady, the Princess Carbon (Miss Reynolds), and fa lan descends to inquire into the matter. He finds that she is in love amongst them. In this he falls, and, accordingly, breaks his heart. He is about to drown himself, when the Spirit of the Brazen Waiters, Brass (Mrs. Keeley), arrests him, and gives him some of the water to drink, as well as a magic flute, to enchant those who listen to it. With this, Brass sends the Prince to the Princess, who also enjoys a flute and water. The Princess then, after an infinity of good situations, until at last he discovers the object of his attachment, and is united to her.

As Mr. Becket's writings, there was an unlimited outlay of jokes hitting at everything—the one that got the best round of applause being an allusion to the Irish members dying on the floor of the house. Still, the piece generally did not call forth that continuous hearty laughter which always attended the representation of "Open Sesame," by the same writers; probably from a conventional notion prevalent amongst dramatists, that any breadth of fun is not suited to the Haymarket audiences, but that, even in a burlesque, more "careful" writing is required. This is wrong; we believe the patrons of Mr. Webster's popular theatre like a good laugh at some good Christmas nonsense, as well as the former Lyceum visitors. All the ladies and gentlemen engaged on the piece played admirably, and an additional word may be said in favour of Mrs. Keeley's Brass—a delicious assumption of insolence. The burlesque is very nicely put upon the stage—a scene in China, where everything resembles porcelain ornaments, being especially ingenious. A first night's reception ought never to be fully taken as a true verdict of a piece; and we doubt not but that "The World Underground" will, after the first nervousness, will be more successful as popular as many that have preceded it. The play bill, by the way, is made out in a novel and humorous manner.

ADELPHI.

Managers will soon get terribly puzzled to know in what manner they can best make out the Christmas bill of fare for their theatres. One critic tells them that pantomime has had its day; and another says that burlesque has been worked threadbare: and then, when a lessee follows both these bits of advice, and brings out an entire novelty, the gentlemen will not believe in it, and behaves badly accordingly. These remarks apply to the production of a novel style of pantomime at the Adelphi, on Monday evening, when Mr. Paul Legrand, from Paris, made his début as Pierrot, in an Italian entertainment; and, in spite of his real ability, was unable to carry it through to a happy termination. When we first saw the piece announced we mistrusted it. We remember witnessing Dubreuse—the King of Pierrots—at his own Boulevard theatre Les Funambules, a few years ago; and, expressive as his pantomime was, we thought the whole affair remarkably "slow." And the Adelphi audience on Monday evening appeared to entertain the same opinion of what they were witnessing. The truth is, that they did not understand it; as somebody observed, they mistook Pierrot at first for a ghost; and then, having but one notion of pantomime, and that being inseparably connected with a clown and pantaloon, they got disappointed and ill-tempered, when they found those personages were not to make their appearance. Mr. Legrand however, must not be cried down. He is wonderful as a pantomimist; but he unfortunately chose a bad vehicle for his action—that is to say bad, regarding the appreciation of his audience. When the alterations and curtailments have been made, we will notice his clever performance again, for it would not be fair to condemn the Adelphi pantomime entirely from its Monday night's reception.

LYCEUM.

We expected something very good at the Lyceum, and we were not disappointed. That many others thought the same was evident from the fact of most of the leading critics of the papers being there in preference to the other houses, on Monday evening. Mr. Planché's tact and delicate humour; Madame Vestris's taste and knowledge for effect; and Mr. W. Beverley's beautiful scenery were certain to produce an excellent pantomime, and, accordingly, the curtain rose on "Little Goodchild Bratcon was put upon the stage, was too good to allow the least chance of failure.

As usual, Mr. Planché has gone back to his old wife, the Countess d'Aulnois, for his fairy tale, and the story of "Le Rameau d'Or" has been wonderfully dramatized by him. Indeed, Planché is fairy-tale proceeding a right old grandmother would tell her grandchildren on a winter's evening. We have seldom seen a burlesque with so many points to tell on a first representation: we never saw one go so smoothly. Every scene and line worked as if it had been a month at its business, and no hitches marred the effects intended. The dresses, decorations, and scenery were magnificent. It would be useless to describe the pantomime, as the cast included all the chief favourites of the house, and the Misses Vestris, Mr. Keeley, and Mr. Bedford showed themselves to be the most perfect pantomimists. Miss Fitzwilliam's dancing was also very good, and the transformation scene was as splendid as light and colour could make it. The curtain fell amidst the most enthusiastic applause, and was raised and lowered for the principal performers, and for Madame Vestris and Mr. Planché, who received a perfect ovation.

It is in this indescribable charm, in this sympathetic influence, in this thrilling feeling, that Madame Vestris stands away over her actress brethren. We have seen her in all characters, and we have always found her the same. In the drawing-room comedy, in the broad farce, in the extravaganza, and in the pantomime, she has been equally successful. Her graceful and fascinating manner, and her thoroughly feminine style, have won for her a place in the affections of the public, which, we believe, no other actress has ever held in this country. Her pantomime dresses, this year, have surpassed anything we have ever seen her wear, and her singing was as good as ever. We have only to add, that the pantomime will be repeated every evening during the holidays, and that it will be followed by a new burlesque, written by Mr. Planché, and produced with the same splendour as the present piece.

PRINCESS'.

The Princess' Theatre is gradually acquiring a reputation for Pantomime, if it has lost all prestige with respect to Opera and Legitimacy. This is in a great measure owing to the comicality of Mr. Paulo Lexmore, as Clown, who is so full of fun and quaint drollery, that he could almost keep a piece going, alone and unaided. We have seen him year after year, and always more than once, and are confident we never laughed so much at anybody else. He is never at a loss on the stage for some appropriate joke; and his pantomime is of the first order. He has, however, a chance of display in a pantomime above the usual standard of excellence, written, we believe, by Mr. Rodwell, and called "The Father Thames, or Harlequin and the Four Seasons," in which Brildlebit, Snaffle, Bimber, and other harness freaks are doing smith's work. Strategy enters, and tells them that Sir Satisfy mare has lost a shoe, and presently put an end to their operations. This very simple introduction to the next scene by a good fairy, who sends forth some sprites to assist the mare, Grizzle. Next we come to the Doctor's house, and are introduced to our old friends Tommy and Harry Bolsover, who had enlisted in the Queen's Guard, and who create great domestic feuds. At last the Doctor starts on his journey, and all the mishaps of that eventful tour are well shown, until he returns home again, when Mr. Lexmore's comicality is again brought into play. The last has been produced at Astley's for several years, and was received with uproarious delight by a very tightly packed audience.

SURREY.

Mr. Bunn was fortunate in securing Mr. W. H. Payne, for he is without his equal—or anything like it—in the opening of a pantomime. Hence "Battledore and Sandcock; or, Harlequin Train Tax, and Tall," went tremendously, more much as Mr. Payne played Young Racket, a fast young gentleman, with a name so associated with the Queen's Bench, that he was at once put down for a scamp. And a very amusing one he made, drilling an army of boys, in the great Shuttlecock War, as he only can. The plot of the opening is of the usual indistinct and confused kind; but what does that matter, when it keeps everybody on the broad grin throughout? Mr. Scudrby, a veteran in the ranks of pantomimists, is the Clown; and Mr. Elar the Harlequin; whilst Miss Annie Payne appears to great advantage as Columbine. If the pantomime is played every night to as good houses as it was on Monday—and we really think it will be, from its excellence—Mr. Bunn will make more money than even his own fairies and genii can count.

SADLER'S WELLS.

The same intelligence which directed the getting up of last year's pantomime at this house, appears to have been again exerted in producing "Harlequin and Little Green Jacket, and the Beau-stalk and the Ogre's Golden Hen," as the Christmas entertainment called. A bounding title it is certainly, and these are so made, that they are funny in the abstract—a rare quality in allusive titles and humorous names. The Stilts are wonderful people in their way, as clowns or sprites; and Miss Clara Harcourt we take to be the prettiest Columbine of the day. Everything is gone at—the Houses of Parliament, the Berkeley squabbles, Derby Sweeps, Income Taxes, Castles, and agricultural novelties; and all this being aided by excellent scenery, and great activity on the part of the pantomimists, makes a capital entertainment. The house was crowded; and by an old Sadler's Wells audience, of course, which is the nicest description, to whom anything might just as well have been played as "Isabella," which was the first piece.

MARYLEBONE.

"Eyes, Nose, and Mouth; or, Harlequin Prince Perfect and the Birth of Beauty," is the pantomime here; and, with the powerful aid of Mr. T. Matthews as Clown it achieved a perfect success, as has been the case ever since it was produced. The scenery and dresses are very good, and the whole is well managed and played, our limits this week prevent us from doing full justice to it, but it will be sufficient for the purpose of the house to state that it was entirely and deservedly successful.

Reports of very creditable pantomimes have reached us from the CITY, VICTORIA, STRAND, and QUEEN'S Theatres—the City, especially, deserving praise for the excellent manner in which it has been produced.

CONVULSION OF NATURE.—We frequently hear the phrase "convulsion of nature," from which we gather that the world in its early days must have been desperately afflicted with fits. It seems, however, that the disease has not yet been entirely got over, as we would respectfully refer to the occurrence of an earthquake that has just taken place in Italy. The shock was felt at Naples, and extended that the Convent has received so much damage that it is certainly the most extensive movement we have heard of for some time. —The Man in the Moon.

MARBLE QUARRY, NEAR LEGHORN. A marble quarry has recently been opened in Maremma, about 35 miles from Leghorn. The quarry appears to have been [illegible] The owner of the quarry is a Greek, who has found three blocks to be peculiar to his own country, here in Tuscany. He can afford this marble for less than one-half the price of Carrara, on account of the great ease and small expense of excavating and taking it to the sea-shore. The marble has a rich warm colour, so desirable in statues and busts, and it is most beautiful in columns, mantel-pieces, and the like. The grain is coarse, like the Parian, but it works smoothly and takes a high polish.

EXTENSIVE ROBBERY AT J. HUME'S, Esq., M.P.—Information was forwarded to the police, on Monday night, that the residence of Joseph Hume, Esq., Bryanstone-square, had been entered, and a quantity of old English and Scotch coins, and, in fact, a complete coin, several large medals of Queen Caroline, a snuff-box of cameos, and a gold guard chain, stolen therefrom.

MUSIC.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH MUSICIANS.

The fifth Concert, on Monday last, directed by Mr. Clinton, with Mr. J. Hopkinson as first violin, commenced with Beethoven's Posthumous Quartet in C Minor, played by Mrs. W. Watson; the violin, tenor, and violoncello parts being sustained by Messrs. W. Watson, R. Blagrove, and Guest. After Miss Ellen Lyon had got through the great "Freischutz" scena, "Softly sighs," Mr. Ferrari sang a clever song by Henry Smart, "When the summer eve falls." The next item was a Quartet in F, by Sharp Minor, for stringed instruments, executed by Messrs. A. Streather, J. F. Jay, R. Blagrove, and Guest, a composition full of promise, by Master H. C. Banister, a juvenile member of an accomplished musical family. A vocal Quartet by Mr. J. R. Tutton, "The Spring is come," sung by Miss E. Lyon, Miss H. E. Salmon, Mr. Land, and Mr. Ferrari, was encored.

The second part began with an Adagio and Rondo, for pianoforte and flute, by Rubian, performed by Messrs. R. Bennett and B. Wells, with ability. Mr. Land sang Macfarren's song, "Ah! non lasciarmi!" Miss H. E. Salmon, Glück's aria from "Orfeo," "Chiamo il mio ben cosi;" and Messrs. Land and Ferrari, and Miss E. Lyon, the trio from John Barnett's "Rosamund," "My Father's Look." A Trio in F, for piano, violin, and violoncello, by Mr. C. E. Stephens, was played by himself, A. Streather, and Guest. The sixth and last Concert will take place on the 10th. We trust the series will close with something more startling than has yet struck the ears of the friends and supporters of the Society.

MENDELSSOHN'S "ANTIGONE."—On Wednesday next, this lyrical tragedy will be produced at the St. James's Theatre, with Madame Rabut Fechter as Antigone, and M. Bocage as Creon. Mr. Benedict will conduct the orchestra, consisting of 8 first violins, 6 second violins, 4 tenors, 4 violoncellos, 4 double basses, 18 wind instruments. The chorus, directed by Mr. Grice, will include about 40 voices. We learn that a performance of the same work will take place shortly at Windsor Castle. Mr. Anderson, master of the Queen's private band, will direct. The play will be read in English by Mr. Bartley. Her Majesty and Prince Albert are enthusiastic admirers of Mendelssohn's compositions.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

Paris, Wednesday.

Another great triumph has been achieved by Alboni, in Rossini's "Cenerentola." Great as she proved herself in the character we have seen her assume, here and in London, it may be fairly stated that this last assumption at the Theatre Italien has been even yet more exalted. It was predicted that her accompagnateur would find it extremely difficult to imagine an Alboni a portly form the half-starved Cinderella of fairy fame. Curiously enough, the two well-fed sisters were remarkably thin; so exceedingly thin as to astonish against Alboni, in her own proper person, and to make the audience forget, in a few minutes, the unfavourable impression of her first appearance, and commence applauding three bars before the audience forgot her obesity, and only recollected that they were listening to the most exquisite tones ever heard from woman's voice.

It is in this indescribable charm, in this sympathetic influence, in this thrilling feeling, that Madame Vestris stands away over her actress brethren. The fifth Concert, on Monday last, directed by Mr. Clinton, with Mr. J. Hopkinson as first violin, commenced with Beethoven's Posthumous Quartet in C Minor, played by Mrs. W. Watson; the violin, tenor, and violoncello parts being sustained by Messrs. W. Watson, R. Blagrove, and Guest. After Miss Ellen Lyon had got through the great "Freischutz" scena, "Softly sighs," Mr. Ferrari sang a clever song by Henry Smart, "When the summer eve falls." The next item was a Quartet in F, by Sharp Minor, for stringed instruments, executed by Messrs. A. Streather, J. F. Jay, R. Blagrove, and Guest, a composition full of promise, by Master H. C. Banister, a juvenile member of an accomplished musical family. A vocal Quartet by Mr. J. R. Tutton, "The Spring is come," sung by Miss E. Lyon, Miss H. E. Salmon, Mr. Land, and Mr. Ferrari, was encored.

The second part began with an Adagio and Rondo, for pianoforte and flute, by Rubian, performed by Messrs. R. Bennett and B. Wells, with ability. Mr. Land sang Macfarren's song, "Ah! non lasciarmi!" Miss H. E. Salmon, Glück's aria from "Orfeo," "Chiamo il mio ben cosi;" and Messrs. Land and Ferrari, and Miss E. Lyon, the trio from John Barnett's "Rosamund," "My Father's Look." A Trio in F, for piano, violin, and violoncello, by Mr. C. E. Stephens, was played by himself, A. Streather, and Guest. The sixth and last Concert will take place on the 10th. We trust the series will close with something more startling than has yet struck the ears of the friends and supporters of the Society.

MENDELSSOHN'S "ANTIGONE."—On Wednesday next, this lyrical tragedy will be produced at the St. James's Theatre, with Madame Rabut Fechter as Antigone, and M. Bocage as Creon. Mr. Benedict will conduct the orchestra, consisting of 8 first violins, 6 second violins, 4 tenors, 4 violoncellos, 4 double basses, 18 wind instruments. The chorus, directed by Mr. Grice, will include about 40 voices. We learn that a performance of the same work will take place shortly at Windsor Castle. Mr. Anderson, master of the Queen's private band, will direct. The play will be read in English by Mr. Bartley. Her Majesty and Prince Albert are enthusiastic admirers of Mendelssohn's compositions.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

Paris, Wednesday.

Another great triumph has been achieved by Alboni, in Rossini's "Cenerentola." Great as she proved herself in the character we have seen her assume, here and in London, it may be fairly stated that this last assumption at the Theatre Italien has been even yet more exalted. It was predicted that her accompagnateur would find it extremely difficult to imagine an Alboni a portly form the half-starved Cinderella of fairy fame. Curiously enough, the two well-fed sisters were remarkably thin; so exceedingly thin as to astonish against Alboni, in her own proper person, and to make the audience forget, in a few minutes, the unfavourable impression of her first appearance, and commence applauding three bars before the audience forgot her obesity, and only recollected that they were listening to the most exquisite tones ever heard from woman's voice.

It is in this indescribable charm, in this sympathetic influence, in this thrilling feeling, that Madame Vestris stands away over her actress brethren. We have seen her in all characters, and we have always found her the same. In the drawing-room comedy, in the broad farce, in the extravaganza, and in the pantomime, she has been equally successful. Her graceful and fascinating manner, and her thoroughly feminine style, have won for her a place in the affections of the public, which, we believe, no other actress has ever held in this country. Her pantomime dresses, this year, have surpassed anything we have ever seen her wear, and her singing was as good as ever. We have only to add, that the pantomime will be repeated every evening during the holidays, and that it will be followed by a new burlesque, written by Mr. Planché, and produced with the same splendour as the present piece.

JULLIEN'S ALBUM FOR 1848. Jullien and Co.

This volume may be regarded more as a gorgeously emblazoned work, than for its musical merits. The covers are elaborately decorated, and will glitter in any gilded drawing-room. There is a portrait of Mr. Broadhurst, as Don Juan, by Mr. Brandard; and a portrait of Jenny Lind, in Amina; the former being too thin, and the latter too stout, in the figures, but the faces are very like. There are other illustrations by Brandard, Phillips, &c., the suggestions are often in name, such as Independence, Love Sweet, Love, the Fair of Venice, and the Mistletoe Bough, as well as appropriate amateur; Macfarren, J. L. Hatton, Lavenu, A. Lee, &c. The best pieces are the dance ones, and herein Julien, Koenig, Barret, &c., have excelled.

THE MUSICAL BIJOU, 1848. D'Almaine and Co., London.

This beautiful annual makes its welcome appearance at the opening of the new year in most attractive guise. In this era of revived letter-press illumination and illustration, there will not, among the many exquisite contributions of the season to the drawing-room table, be one which surpasses, and few that rival, the "Musical Bijou" in beauty of embellishment. The frontispiece, title-page, border, &c., executed by Mr. Brandard, are printed in chromo-lithography, with a very delicate tint. The designs are chaste, and, unless slightly altered, from the Sèvres and other illuminated manuscripts in the Louvre Collection of the Bibliothèque Royale. The best pieces are by Macfarren, Mellon, Balfe, Lavenu, Julien, &c., &c., and have also the dance ones, and herein Julien, Koenig, Barret, &c., have excelled.

A delicate melodic air, which was last heard tenderly at the opera Comique, the halo Marguerite sings, Marcel [illegible] at the opera Comique. At the Opera National, Montigny's opera of "Wahr, ou Neuhaus Trouvé," has been revived with success. It was first played at Fontainebleau, in 1777. The concert for the benefit of Habeneck, the veteran conductor of the Société des Concerts, was brilliantly attended. Alard distinguished himself in Beethoven's Violin Concerto.

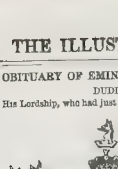
OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

DUDLEY, EARL OF HARROWBY.

His Lordship, who had just completed his 85th year, died suddenly on Sunday, the 26th ult. He was the eldest son of Nathaniel, first Lord Harrowby, by Elizabeth, his wife, daughter and co-heir of Dr. Barrick, Bishop of London; and grandson of Sir Dudley Ryder, Lord Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench. Soon after attaining his majority, the noble Lord, Viscount Sandon, was returned and entered on public life, and obtained a seat in Parliament. In 1809, he became Treasurer of the Navy; and in 1804, on the return of Mr. Pitt to power, was appointed Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. In 1812, he received, in Lord Liverpool's Administration, the dignified appointment of Lord



President of the Council, which he continued to hold for the unprecced period of seven years. During recent political struggles, Lord Harrowby has abstained from all interference. At the period of his decease, he was a Governor of the Charter House, a Doctor of Civil Law, a Trustee of the British Museum, High Steward of Tiverton, &c.

His married, in 1795, Lady Susan Leveson Gower, daughter of Granville, first Marquis of Stafford, and by her, (who died in 1838), had four sons and five daughters, viz., DUDLEY, Lord Sandon, now second Earl of Harrowby; Granville George, R.N.; Lady Susan, late Viscountess Encington; Mary, wife of Captain Edward Saurin, R.N.; Georgiana Elizabeth, Lady Wharncliffe; Harriet, married to Lord Charles Harervey; and Louisa, married to the Hon. George Fortescue.

ADMIRAL SIR GEORGE PARKER.

THIS distinguished naval veteran died on the 24th ult., at his residence, near Great Yarmouth, of a severe attack of influenza, in the 81st year of his age, and after seventy years' devotion to his country's service. He entered the navy, under his uncle, Sir Peter Parker, and was early employed in the East Indies, on board the Malabar coast. In 1791, he participated as Lieutenant of that vessel, in the capture of the French frigate, La Resolue. He next served under Duncan, in the turn of the French frigate, La Resolue. He next served under Duncan, in the North seas, and made several captures, when in the latter, Sarpentria. In 1808 he was in command of a squadron in the Baltic, and was frozen in for some time at Gottenburg. In the same year, in company with the Nassau, he captured and destroyed the Danish 74-gun ship, the Aboukir, and proceeded with it to Walcheren. Sir George was born in 1767, the son of George Parker, Esq. His grandfather, Rear-Admiral Sir Christopher Parker, was the naval distinction in the early part of the eighteenth century, and his uncle, Sir Peter Parker, Admiral of the Fleet, was created a Baronet, 28th Dec., 1782, in requital of his gallant services, more particularly in an attack on Charlestown. The action was one of the most sanguinary fought during the American war. The quarter-deck of the Bristol (Parker's ship) was cleared of every man but himself.

MARIA LOUISA, DUCHESS OF PARMA.

ACCOUNTS from Italy announce the death, on the 9th ult., of Maria Louisa, Duchess of Parma, Piacentia, and Guastalla.

The still pale shadow of the infirst Queen
That earth has yet to see or to her bath seen.

Maria Louisa had lived to be very nearly the longest reigning Sovereign of Europe, thirty four years having elapsed since she exchanged, for the portion of an Archduchess, her share in the Throne of the French Empire. Her Highness of an Archduchess, her share in the Throne of the French Empire. Her Highness was born at Vienna, 12th December, 1791, the eldest daughter of Francis II., Emperor of Austria, by Maria Theresa, daughter of Ferdinand IV., King of Sicily. Her marriage to Napoleon took place on the 2nd April, 1810—the most brilliant epoch in the career of that illustrious soldier Paris was then the capital of an European Empire. The spoils of all nations, save one, were collected in her halls; the Princes of all nations, save one, formed the circle of the Imperial Court. And yet, within four brief years, this mighty power passed away, like a meteoric splendour. The Emperor departed an exile from France, and his Austrian bride became Sovereign of the little Duchy of Parma.

Her father place was by St. Helen's wave.
Her only throne was in Neuport and Lucca.

The only child of Maria Louisa, by Bonaparte, was a son, the late Duke of Reichstadt, born 20th March, 1811, who died unmarried, at the Palace of Schoenbrunn, near Vienna, 22nd July, 1832.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Money has again been easier this week, and a reduction to 4 per cent in the rate allowed for fixed periods, or "at call," has been made by the various discount houses. The rate of discount for the ordinary description of trade paper, is about 5½ per cent.; for first-rate paper, not more than 5 per cent. is demanded.

Letters from Paris mention that the effect of the reduction of the rate of discount by the Bank of France to 4 per cent., had been to create considerable activity in business, notwithstanding the Christmas holidays

The creditors of the estate of Messrs. Abbott, Nottingham, and Co., shawl warehousemen, of Aldermanbury, have consented to accept a secured composition of 6s. in the pound, payable in equal instalments, at three, six, and nine months' date.

The estate of Messrs. Coates and Hillard, of Friday-street, will be administered by the Court of Bankruptcy; a flat has also been issued against Messrs. Gates and Company, of Watling-street,

The suspension of Messrs. Job Wright, and Co., Russian merchants, was announced on Tuesday. The liabilities are stated at £60,000, and the assets at £30,000. Little doubt is entertained of an ultimate liquidation in full.

The reconstruction of the Union Bank of Ireland, which suspended on the 21st of October, has been the subject of conversation during the week. The existing liabilities are recommended to be paid by the realization of the assets of the concern, and any calls on the present shareholders, and a fresh capital for the concern, and the business of the bank raised by the creation of 30,000 new shares preserving the business of the bank raised by the creation of 30,000 new shares of £10 each, of which £5 is to be called up, and on which it is proposed to be made prefrence dividend of 7 per cent. Some changes are also proposed to be made in the constitution of the bank, a range which are the abolition of the office of general director, and the appointment of two of the ordinary directors to co-act with the manager, all differences between whom are to be decided at the monthly meeting of the general board. Such guarantee or reserve fund as may from time to time be formed, are to be invested in Exchequer Bills or other Government securities. The winding of the bank is recommended for the 1st of vermont securities. The winding of the bank is recommended for the 1st of vermont securities. The winding of the bank is recommended for the 1st of February, from which period the accounts will be kept separate from all previous transactions. Under the existing deed of settlement a majority is necessary for the confirmation of general meetings of the shareholders will be necessary for the confirmation of these arrangements.

The English Funds opened firmly on Monday, registering a slight advance. Consols realised 89¾ for money, and closed with an appearance of firmness, which was confirmed by the result of Tuesday's prices, the closing quotation being an advance of ¼ per cent. on the prices of the previous day. On Wednesday, however, a slight reaction occurred; and, notwithstanding the peaceful character of the French King's speech, some sales depreciated Consols to the extent of ⅛ per cent. This downward movement continued on Thursday, the extent of ⅛ per cent. This downward movement continued on Thursday, the Exchequer Bills have been steadiness, the dulness of the weather, and a few sales, made ostensibly on the unsatisfactory state of France socially, and the fall in the French Rentes, resulted in Consols quoting yesterday's prices. To-day a rise is anticipated, which will probably close the week, and still promise to improve. Bank Stock is firm, and the closing quotations of the few funds open are:— Bank Stock, 187½; Reduced, 89¾; New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cent Annuities, 89¼; Long Annuities expire Jan. 1860, 8 11-16ths; Ditto, Oct. 10, 1859, 8 7-16ths: India Bonds, under £1000, par; Consols for Account, 89⅝; Exhequer Bills, 12 14.

The dividend on Spanish Three per Cents, due 1st December, 1847, as well as Mexican, 3 per Cent, 1846, 18½; Spanish, 5 per Cent, 1840, 19½; Ditto, Passive, 4½; Ditto, 3 per Cent, 20¾; Venezuela Bonds, 21 per Cent, 26; Ditto, Deferred, 10½; Dutch, 2½ per Cent, 12 Guild., 55½; Ditto, Account, 56; Ditto, 4 per Cent Certificates, 85.

There was a slight appearance of animation in the Railway Market at the commencement of the week, but the decline in the value of the Spanish Three per Cents, on Thursday, advanced a turn, but this arose more from the payment of the dividend than any political cause. The closing prices (nominally) of the other securities are—for Brazilian Bonds, 80; Chilian Bonds, 5 per Cent, 98; Mexican, 5 per Cent, 1846, 18½; Spanish, 5 per Cent, 1840, 19½; Ditto, Passive, 4½; Ditto, 3 per Cent, 20¾; Venezuela Bonds, 21 per Cent, 26; Ditto, Deferred, 10½; Dutch, 2½ per Cent, 12 Guild., 55½; Ditto, Account, 56; Ditto, 4 per Cent Certificates, 85.

Business continues to be perfectly unimportant in the Foreign Market. Mexican alone, on Wednesday, quoting a point below Monday's price; since which, an improvement has placed the price ½ per cent in advance. Spanish Three per Cents, on Thursday, advanced a turn, but this arose more from the payment of the dividend than any political cause. The closing prices (nominally) of the other securities are—for Brazilian Bonds, 80; Chilian Bonds, 5 per Cent, 98; Exchequer Bills have been steadiness during the week, and still promise to improve. Bank Stock is firm, and the closing quotations of the few funds open are:— Bank Stock, 187½; Reduced, 89¾; New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cent Annuities, 89¼; Long Annuities expire Jan. 1860, 8 11-16ths; Ditto, Oct. 10, 1859, 8 7-16ths: India Bonds, under £1000, par; Consols for Account, 89⅝; Exhequer Bills, 12 14.

SATURDAY MORNING.—The English Market was heavy during the whole of yesterday, and the failure of an old-established firm trading with India and South America, added to the depression. Consols closed at 89¼ for the Opening. The Share Market and Foreign Market partook of the general heaviness, without anything occurring worthy of record.

TWELFTH NIGHT CHARACTERS—1848.

KING.

The maxim's rife in law-books drear and long,
Whatever hap—the King can do no wrong.
So now, to-night, whate'er my deeds may be,
Remember—no one's to find fault with me.

MISS CAROLINE COQUETTE.

I'm a flirt—I avow it—there's no one occasion
On which I don't get up a bit of flirtation;
Now if's Fred, now it's Harry, who thinks me his own,
Then stands staring aghast when he finds the bird flown!

BEAU WHIPPERSNAPPER.

Letter A, Number One, is the title which falls
To Old England's crack ships, her most staunch wooden walls;
And I, too, am A. 1, if you give me my due,
And count, after wooden walls, wooden heads, too.

QUEEN.

Queen for the night—be mine the pomp and pride
To rule the Sovereign of this bright fireside.
Your smile my tribute—your good will my power—
Could ever Princess boast a richer dower?

A ROYAL BEEFEATER.

Lusty and trusty—burly and bold—
Flourish your carving-knife—never cry hold;
Up to your duty—never shrink back,
While there's beef on the platter and ale in the Jack!

NELLY VIOLET.

What's prettier than a pretty flower
Fed in Grove, by Sun and Shower?
What's prettier?—Why! a pretty face—
One look at you will prove my case.

LORD GOLDLACE

Great Britain her glory may owe to the sailor;
But, for mine, I'm indebted alone to my tailor;
For men of my pedigree held it no sin
To be glittering without although empty within.

DUCHESS OF DAFFODILS.

Room, for the Duchess of Daffodils,
With a pedigree older by far than the hills,
And this privileges proud, le her form or her face
As ugly as sin, men still talk of "Her Grace."

CAPTAIN BLUNDERBUSS.

Zounds! drums! trumpets! and thunder!
Do I look like a man who would ever knock under?
That martial appearance for nothing I'd barter,
For I'd look just as fierce were I bawling for quarter!

TWELFTH NIGHT CHARACTERS—1848.

MONSIEUR FRANCOIS PARLEZ-VOUS.

THE PROFESSOR'S LADY.

BY BERTHOLD AUERBACH.

AUTHOR OF "VILLAGE TALES OF THE BLACK FOREST."

TRANSLATED BY MARY HOWITT.

WHEN Reinhard returned home from these visits, he often felt the old discontented and irritable sentiment in his heart: his domestic circle seemed so circumscribed—so like something in common life; and when Lorle expressed her feelings and her thoughts in her child-like stammering manner, he seldom listened to them, and still more seldom took the trouble of correcting or improving them: he was wearied of teaching the A B C of mental cultivation. He now also became susceptible to little instances of awkwardness or want of grace in her: her quick and somewhat heavy step was unpleasing to him; and when she lifted a glass, let it be as light as it might, it was not done elegantly with the fingers, but with ti e whole hand. Her movements, which had been so elastic and pleasing in her village costume, were, in the dress of the city, heavy and constrained: she trod firmly upon her heels in walking; and when he begged of her to try to acquire that easy and floating kind of gait which walking more upon the toe gives, she replied, "I need not learn all that now; I was able to walk before I was a twelvemonth old."

Reinhard had no acquaintance among the general inhabitants of the city; and as regarded his brother artists, he stood in a very awkward position. He had been elected to his office without any preparation: some of them, therefore, believed that he had obtained his appointment by some indirect means, whilst envy and bitterness caused others to pass unjust judgment on the Painter and his works. Out of the Court circle, therefore, he had no acquaintance excepting the Sub-Librarian, who often vexed him by expressing so openly the opinion that no man of honour would allow himself to mix in society which was so vitally unsound as that his admission to it must be made an exception to its laws. And, besides this, he quarrelled doubly with Reinhard, because he wanted to make Lorle, that fresh child of Nature, as artificial as the beings around him.

CHAPTER VIII.

HIGH LIFE AND THE BREAD OF PRINCES.

Lorle's life was very solitary. Her husband spent most of his evenings from home, and his days were often passed in the chase with some of the gentlemen of the Court; and besides this, he was now busy fitting up his painting room in one of the upper chambers of the Royal stables. Lorle had never yet been there.

Bärbel had fallen into bad health, and Lorle grieved deeply. One day Reinhard said that the old servant must return home, at which Lorle wept so bitterly that it was with great difficulty he could pacify her. He now left his wife very much to herself, and when now and then he tried to school her into anythings she obstinately opposed herself to him: she had been humble as long as he was devoted to her; her whole day's occupation had been one long waiting for him—her work merely an amusement till his return; but now, when he had scarcely a word to say to her, was ill-tempered, and hardly ever spoke but to blame her, or teach her something, she listened to his remarks without a word. Reinhard also was unhappy in the highest degree.

Bärbel was deeply grieved at the disunion which had so soon taken place between the young couple; she tried to comfort Lorle, and her main hope was that all would get right if there were but a child. Lorle, at this suggestion, fell weeping on her breast.

"I fear," said she, "that that will never be. It was sinful in me to be painted with a child on my lap which represented the Saviour. I did not want to be painted in that way, but he would have it. God be merciful to me, and forgive me my sin!"

Bärbel tried to talk her out of these sad thoughts; but she believed more in them than even poor Lorle herself.

A whim of the higher powers unexpectedly brought Lorle into connection with her husband's elevated circle. He came home one evening unusually early, and announced that the Prince wished to speak with Lorle, and that therefore she was to go with him the next day to the picture gallery. He was prudently silent about the Prince wishing to see the original of the Madonna.

"I would rather not; I have nothing to get from Princes," replied Lorle.

"Ah, child, there's nothing in that," said he; "people must obey the wish of a Prince, else they give offence; people are not to be asked whether they will or not; and I have promised."

"Well! I will," said poor Lorle; "but yet let me say one thing, if it is to be so, I shall not at all know whether what I do is foolish or not; I—I don't know in the least what I should do!"

Reinhard spoke kindly and assuringly to her. "Give yourself no more trouble," said she; "I am satisfied, do you be so too; only I do wish the whole world would leave me in quiet; I want nothing from it."

Reinhard went to the Sub-Librarian's, to ask his sister to come the next morning and assist Lorle in dressing for the audience, and then he went with his friend to the beer-house, where he spent his evenings. There, in a small room, he found several young lawyers, physicians, tradespeople, and mechanics, comfortably sitting together, smoking, drinking, and talking. At first, there was a silent astonishment to see the young courtier enter their circle, but presently the conversation went on in its usual course. The profoundest questions of the day were here discussed with an acuteness, a penetration, and an ardour, which silently amazed him; and it appeared to him that, through a whole month in the most brilliant saloons, was not heard as much original wit and penetrative knowledge as within this short space of time, in this mean and dimly-lighted room. The noise and the downright earnestness seemed new and strange to him for he came from those circles where people talk low and smile, instead of disputing and laughing. Neither was a monarchical centre wanting here, and, strange enough, this was the Sub-Librarian; his powerful voice and extensive knowledge secured to him this dignity without etiquette. Reinhard remained here longer than he at first intended; it was full of intense interest for him.

Leopoldine came. She helped Lorle to dress; taught her how to make a curtsey, and how she must address the Crown-Prince. Lorle seemed to assent to all, but no sooner was Leopoldine gone than she threw off her cap and chemisette, saying to her husband, "I will not go! I will not! I am not a simpleton, and you let me be made a fool of. I know very well when people make me stupid: I am always worse then; and I am so short-tempered and impatient. Good God! what shall I become?" said poor Lorle, in the bitterness of her heart.

She wept aloud. "Nothing," said Reinhard, with emotion; "nothing different to what you are, only be a good child."

"I have told you a hundred times that I am not a child," returned she; "but now I will go and dress myself properly; and you shall see that I will not make any mistake."

They went to the gallery. Reinhard scarcely dared to do more than to give Lorle a few general rules for her behaviour. She now saw, for the first time, Reinhard's painting-room; she was shocked at the state of disorder in which it was: she wished so much to straighten things, and Reinhard was obliged most earnestly to beg her to be quiet, lest she should soil her splendid white kid gloves. She was in a state of feverish excitement; she could not sit still for a single moment; she wished not to look abashed, but to shew the Prince that neither was she a fool, and to convince Reinhard also that she was able to speak to any one, let him be whoever he would. Reinhard observed this state of excitement with alarm; he would gladly have controlled her, but he had lost from his hand the reins that had formerly held this simple being in order; he could do nothing more than beg of her to be quiet. At length the Prince was announced. They went to the great hall, but here again they had to wait, and all this arriving, waiting, announcing, and again waiting, made Lorle rather afraid; she felt as if something very extraordinary were about to happen. The Prince hastily entered in his uniform, and, bowing, he came up to Lorle.

"I am glad to see you, Mrs. Reinhard," said he in a familiar tone.

"Many thanks, your Royal Highness," returned she.

"Well, how do you like our city?"

Lorle, spite of Reinhard's admonishing glance, had immediately taken off her gloves; she knew not that she could speak so much better without them; and she replied, "Well, when one is married it ought to please one; it is very beautiful and clean, but the houses are so very high!"

"I have often thought," began the Prince again, "that the peasants are the happiest of people."

"Then your Royal Highness is wrong," said she; "it is not so; they have to work like day-labourers, and to pay more taxes than the Barons, as my father used to say."

Reinhard stood as if on burning coals; it was an unheard of thing that any one should tell the Prince that he was wrong. The Prince fixed his eyes on Lorle and smiled; and then, turning round, and pointing to the Madonna, he said, "I have seen you before now, Mrs. Reinhard."

"To be sure! Does your Royal Highness remember when we were little? You are just eight weeks older than I am; I know your birthday well, because we always had buns at the school on that day. Do you remember our coming through our village? You had at that time long light curls, and a worked collar on. We had for three weeks before, talked and dreamed about nothing but the Prince coming. There was no school the afternoon before, and hardly anything done on that day: and there we all stood with nosegays in our hands, and Martin was up on the church-tower; and when your Royal Highness reached our Market-place, all the bells began to ring, and they fired off little cannon; and we little children all gave a leap for joy, and the teacher cried out, "Hush! be quiet!" And then we soon heard the coach coming; and then it came and stopped just beside us, and the Burgomaster spoke a poem to your Royal Highness; and then all we children shouted 'Viva!' And then away went the coach and the Prince, who, however, took off his little cap with a tassel, and we threw away our nosegays, and then the attendants' carriage came and went over all our beautiful flowers."

The Prince was evidently affected. "If I known that you were there," said he, "I would have alighted. I wish you had been my little playfellow then."

"Yes, that might have been," returned she. "I had the most sincere sympathy for you; you had a poor life of it; never a minute to yourself—out in the wood, and in the village. You never ran anybody with you but grown-ups, old people hanging about you, and never leaving you a minute to yourself. Did your Royal Highness ever look up to a tree when there was not some Chamberlain by?"

The Prince took Lorle's hand. "You are an excellent creature," said he. "Yes, it is a melancholy life, that of a Prince."

"Well, it is not so bad but that it can be borne," said she; "it does not seem to have gone so very ill with your Royal Highness; and, as I had my ears boxed because of you, it remains all the better in my memory."

"How was that?" asked the Prince.

"While your Royal Highness was at the Springs, I was there, too, with my Birbel, and we were standing at the park gates, and you were walking in the garden, you let your pocket-handkerchief fall, and there came rushing up a very old man, with white hair, from among your attendants, and picked it up for you. When Birbel saw this, she said that you would be spoiled; and I said, that, if I were a Prince, I would not have those old people, with stars on their breasts, picking up what I dropped; and, for saying that, Birbel boxed my ears desperately. Well, it did me no harm, and the people say a deal of good of your Royal Highness."

"You make me happy by telling me that my subjects think well of me."

"I could not have believed, for my life, that I should have talked in this way with your Royal Highness," said Lorle naïvely, "and now I would say something more"

"Speak freely and openly," said the Prince

"Yes, good Heaven! that I might but now speak to some purpose," said she earnestly. "Your Royal Highness should see for yourself what an awful deal of want and misery there is in the country, and then I think you could and must help it."

"How do you think that it could be helped?" asked the Prince

"Yes, how? that I don't know; and therefore it is that your Highness has power given to you and to your learned gentlemen, who must and should set about relieving it."

"You are a wise and excellent woman," said the Prince, "and it is to be wished that all in your native place were like you."

"My father used to say," returned Lorle, "that if we paid poll-tax, we should not pass for nothing. And now may your Highness soon get an excellent wife! Is it true that you are soon to be married?"

In the pause which now ensued both embarrassment and smiles passed over Reinhard's countenance.

Lorle had addressed the Prince with the utmost familiarity; but that was nothing to the terrible blunder of asking a Prince point-blank a question which he, perhaps, could or would not answer. Lorle, however, expressed here openly and fearlessly what, in the highest circles, they only venture to touch upon with the utmost diplomatic reserve, as a marriage was in agitation.

"It may be," replied the Prince goodnaturedly; "it may be, if I can meet with such a pretty, amiable lady as you."

"That is nothing," replied Lorle; "people should not jest with married women. And now, may God preserve your Royal Highness," said she, offering her hand to take leave.

At that moment, the Adjutant came to announce that the review had commenced. Both the Prince and Reinhard accompanied her to the door.

"Professor!" exclaimed the Prince, as he was going, Reinhard turned back, and stood like one electrified, as if every nerve must listen.

"Do you know the most precious gem of art which we have in this gallery?"

"Which does your Royal Highness think most highly of?"

"Your gem of simple nature is the greatest of them all."

These words of praise passed through the mouths of the Adjutant into the highest circles, and for some days Lorle was the talk of the whole court.

This audience, however, completed in a peculiar manner the inward breach between Reinhard and the Court; it sounded him that this visit should have been arranged to fill up an interval of idleness, whilst to him and his wife it was a question of vital importance.

He was full of grief, because Lorle so frequently committed herself with strangers; it seemed to him as if she had taken a great deal more than she really had done, and it provoked him that her naïveté of character should be regarded with contempt, as, perhaps, turned to ridicule. He had a presentiment that this frank, unreserved, and confiding creature was only fitted for village life, where none are strangers to each other; where the doors are open to all, where they go in and out of each other's houses through the whole village, and where all are known to each other from their youth upwards, with all their peculiarities of character and fate.

How easily is a mind deluded which has once let in a misunderstanding: and Reinhard, instead of feeling ashamed for the unmerciful, natural strength of character which was revealed by this last occurrence, only saw with regret a rough obstinacy which repelled every element of cultivation.

CHAPTER IX

This last occurrence had in two ways sown deadly seed, or had caused that which already was there to shoot forth. Now, however, Lorle was occupied in watching a life already visibly shaken. Birbel could not leave her bed; and from this time Lorle was capable of nothing but attending to her faithful old servant; and before long she had the pleasant to and her recovering. The physician explained that probably the cause of Birbel's declining health was the want of her laborious work in the open air; and Reinhard was, therefore, very urgent that she should go home, to Lorle's joy, for old women are always attached that she would rather die than leave her. It will easily be understood that Reinhard's home was not now a cheerful one: it was vexatious to him that all his domestic life should be disturbed for a woman servant, and Lorle's distress to say as much as this to his wife, because he was firmly convinced that she could not understand his state of mind, and would necessarily mistake his meaning.

Autumn came—the trees. The cold season took to her sick bed, and in a few days died. Lorle's distress was indescribable. Her husband sympathized with her, but to him her grief seemed beyond the occasion. He had also a deal to do to settle misunderstandings between his wife and her new domestics

A dark winter succeeded. Reinhard went much less into society than formerly; he was no longer a novelty, and, besides this, evidently out of favour. And what does society trouble itself about the unhappy? It must have cheerfulness, even if that cheerfulness be assumed; and as for the world of high life, it recognises only those who are favourites of fortune. In the first instance, these repulses distressed Reinhard; and afterwards his endeavour was to avoid them. He was not, however, much at home, but had joined the circle of the Sub-Librarian. He and his friend now heard themselves with the design of a satirical illustrated work. Reinhard drew excellent designs for it; but the Sub-Librarian was very slow in preparing the letter-press which was to accompany them. When Reinhard had an engagement for the evening, his wife frequently have early, and repair in his dress suit to the little tobacco-reeking room at the beer-house, where he would remain late at night, and often afterwards walk for hours through the empty streets with his friend.

Lorle's life was more and more lonely; an inexpressible yearning, a homesickness, filled her soul, although she strove against it. Often did she think on that hour after her marriage when she had said to herself, that she could not bear herself; when she was so infinitely happy: now she felt how hard it is to spend a long and anxious life in dwelling on one happy moment. She coveted a kind word from her husband: a little praise from him would frequently have early, and repair in his dress suit to the little tobacco-reeking room at the beer-house, more

AN INITIATORY GRAMMAR of the ENGLISH LANGUAGE, with numerous Exercises. By JOHN MILLEN.

This work on English Grammar is divided into the usual divisions, namely Orthography, Etymology, and Syntax. Under the second of these are given some general rules or principles for the formation of words from others, and a copious account of the subject which is but little attended to in most elementary books on English Grammar, although extensively and properly used in Latin and Greek. Next comes the Syntax or Construction of Sentences, and a variety of other Exercises, designed to impress more deeply on the mind of the pupil the information contained in Part I. and to lead him gradually from a knowledge of single words to the important art of forming sentences. He will also be aided in the first attempts at composition, and be prepared to enter upon the study of such other works on the subject as will enlarge his acquaintance with the English Language, and enable him to express his ideas with precision and fluency

TO THE PUBLIC.

"Look here upon this picture and on this."—SHAKESPEARE.

As now another year has passed away,

MOSES and SON their wonted tribute pay,

And first the Public, as is proper

The many favours of another year,

On them their warm acknowledgements bestow made,

For vast success and glorious public aid,

But never of a such success could appear

As that which honoured the departed year.

Spring, Summer, Autumn, Winter, have their proof

Of crowding there is where a Servile, the leading roof!

When January's frosts are keenly felt,

Thousands with Moses liberally dealt,

And winter over-coats, to suit the cold,

Were purchased at Moses' warehouse and all sold.

In February a month, and blushing March,

The Pub is sought the Emporium to try and arch;

In fickle April, and in master May,

Moses and Son's Spring dresses have the survey!

In pleasant June and changeable July,

Vast multitudes were daily seen to buy,

And such supporters failed not to remember

The Day Annual of the Moses' Anniversary,

And in October's month the thousands press

At Moses' Mart for seasonable Autumn Dress

In cold November, and dismal December too,

Moses and Son were ever kept in view,

And thus did new encouragement gather

Throughout the circle of the by-gone year,

Not one of the subject matter of the Public,

And all, in the Firs which finds use

And further support hopes might also see,

Obtaining "first class" Hats at Eighty three.

In lower and more humble Outfits too

The trade at Moses' Warehouse day by grew

The glorious facts of years have conferred

Proclaim the by-gone year unprecedented

Year truly a memorable one to be,

Crowding the spacious warehouse all day long,

While all the current coins with constant jingle

And deal of busy stir were heard to mingle

Nor was it any sight to cause a frown

While orders for Surgeons were pouring down.

Such were the hasty and success swelly took

And very much of the same kind the book.

The cutting-room at Moses' Mart has been

A centre of life, as ever busy scene

No time for idleness, no lengthy leisure,

Could here be had, for cutt, shape, or measure

All was activity in every part

And Business "round the room at Moses' Mart.

Though scarcity of money raised alarm,

Moses and Son were ever kept in view.

No; on the contrary, as people found

The real value of a correct pound,

Very Moses' Mart was crowded that there

Unmatched economy is brought to bear

What new scheme, a task involves on Moses,

Now Eight-and-Forty-Seven for ever closes,

Most hearty thanks, from Moses Moses tender

Their thanks for what a generous public render

But thanks, ten thousand times Large might repeat,

And leave the task of thanking incomplete,

Yet, gratitude's sincere in my thanks I ask,

And thus they ruled to eighteen for y ar

In eighteen forty-eight may more appear

Beyond the bounds of each succeeding year.

The recent purchases which they have made

Will add new benefits to all their trade.

When all the markets were depressed they bought

Far most cheap, their cash most heavily wrought,

They saw the opportunity, and now

A most immense reduction they allow

Such are the benefits which have await

The purchasers of Eighteen Forty-Eight

May Moses and the Public ever be

On pleasure of tenders' terms

May both the buyers and the sellers find

That all the mutual ends are combined.

And may the friends of Moses, small and great,

Enjoy in every possible estate

A Happy Year in Eighteen Forty-Eight

II.

My New Year's Song shall be of Love,
That warms the maiden's heart,
Whose radiant eyes shall light her skies,
And blushing bliss impart:
He'll ring the wedding bells, and while
Their music thrills her ear,
Hear her sweet carol, through a smile,
Sing "Welcome Happy Year!"

III.

My New Year's Song shall be of Pride
(By no mean thought defiled),
The lovers of its gentle bride,
The parents of the r child!
Pride in springing hopes and Love,
That ever keep life dear,
And flings with bloom Time's freshest plume,
The Welcome Happy Year!

IV.

My New Year's Song shall be of Home,
The sweetest theme, and best,
That sue is its bliss in Nature's kiss,
Affection's hallowed rest!
The truest haven of the heart
For comfort or for cheer,
Long may its fine fair influence shine
Thro' every Happy Year.
